"He's over to the Glendale sanitarium now for his health—got nervous dyspepsia, or some such thing. Well, I must be rushing along."

Halting in the doorway, she called back sharply: "If that good-for-nothing brother of Edwin's comes 'round here tomorrow asking for us, you send him about his business lively. He can smell a Christmas dinner a mile off."

The door closed resoundingly.

Sunshine poured into the spotless kitchen in a golden flood, lingered lovingly on the bright braided rugs and china closets laden with willowware, china and pewter. The grandfather clock ticked contentedly in a corner. The kettle hummed drowsily. Gleeful, the canary sang one exultant song after another.

The table with its cheerful red cloth had been drawn up to the window, daintily set for grandma's luncheon. It was the same tranquil scene upon which her eyes had rested on hundreds of other days, and upon which, after tomorrow, they would never rest again. And tomorrow was Christmas! —a day when the friendly ghosts of all the Christmases that were would steal lovingly back, only to flee in horror at lack of festal board and Christmas cheer!

It must have been the affecting picture of those disappointed ghosts of other Christmases that impelled grandmother to sit erect, swab her red eyelids, stiffen her trembling chin and resolve to thrust her troubles into the background 'til Christmas should be over. "I'll have a Christmas dinner," she planned, "just as if nothing had happened and—why, I'll invite Edwin's brother!"

Christmas morning grandmother was early astir. Sprigs of holly graced the many-paned windows. The deep armchair had been drawn invitingly before the fireplace. The plump and tender turkey was turning an irresistible brown. Onions, turnips, squash and potatoes — white and "sweets"—were cooking merrily. The cranberry sauce had been strained and set to cool upon the pantry window-sill, and, adhering to a long-established precedent, grandmother slipped away to don her black silk dress, lace cap and snowy apron.

She was becoming a trifle anxious about her guest when she spied a gaunt figure coming up the walk. She fluttered hospitably to the doorway and beamed at the visitor.

"I declare I was getting worried for fear you wouldn't come, after all," she said. "Edwin and Effie Ann have gone away and you're to have dinner with me. I'll dish it right up."

The visitor's gaze fastened itself upon the loaded table, and power of speech seemed to desert him.

At grandmother's request he dexterously carved the turkey, and having served his hostess, devoted himself unreservedly to eating.

"My land," mused grandmother, aghast, "that poor creature must have been fasting for a week!"

But when the Indian pudding, pumpkin pie and fruit cake had been eaten and they were picking placidly at the nuts, the guest waxed talkative.

"How this all reminds me of home when I was a little boy—this room—a facsimile!—and you—how you remind me of mother! It must be great," he broke off sharply, "for you to have your own little home all to yourself—eh?"

The Christmas sun was already setting, reminding grandmother that her last day was almost over. With a sudden sob she shed her gallant garment of pretense, and in an overpowering hunger for sympathy, she quavered out her sad little story.

"I'm not the guest you were expecting but when I saw that dinner—well, you couldn't understand unless you'd lived for three weeks on prunes and toast and skim milk. Anyway, I was ravenous from hunger and I haven't had a dinner of such pure, unadulterated bliss since mother cooked it. What I came over for today was to say—er—that—er—why, my wife finds she wants to live nearer the city, so I want you to consider this house absolutely yours as long as you need it. I'll have it put in writing tomorrow."

He shouldered hurriedly into his coat, then halted irresolutely in the doorway. "Maybe, some time," he ventured, uncertainly, "you'd be willing to teach my wife to cook."

The Christmas-Present Letter

by HELEN GAISFORD

THERE was sadness in the Jordon's cottage on Indian Hill. Even the merriment of an aprpoaching Christmas season could not supersede the fact that Foster Jordan was going blind. Blind!

That was bad enough. But Foster Jordan, swathed in bandages from the operation that had failed, knew that Helen could never carry on alone. It had been so expensive, that operation that had only served to pronounce his doom more surely. All their savings were gone, and what could the most faithful of wives do, with a baby in arms, and a blind husband? The cottage would go, too, and then—

He roused himself from these gloomy forebodings at the sound of her step at the door. And that she should not think him grieving, he began to sing.

"Foster," his wife called, as the door opened, "who do you suppose is here? My old chum, Pauline Westland! You know, the costume designer in New York? Paulina, this is my husband, that I've written you so much about."

"How do you do, Miss Westland. Sorry I can't—my eyes, you know—"

"Of course. I'm so glad to meet you, Mr.—may I call you Foster? Helen has told me so much about you."

"And oh, Pauline," Helen interrupted, "here is our baby. Isn't he adorable?" Then in a whisper, "Do look more cheerful, darling! If you don't I'll cry and I mustn't do that!"

"The doctors give you no hope?"

"None whatever. But we'll get along—somehow—" Helen dabbed at her eyes with her handkerchief. "Foster, dear," she said aloud, "you were singing as we came in. Won't you sing for Pauline?"

"Yes, please do."

"I'm afraid I can't."

"Yes, you can, dear. I'll play for you." And so he sang.

At last their guest rose to go. "I can't tell you how I've enjoyed your songs," she said. "I'm so glad I stopped off on my way home for the holidays."

"You must come again," Helen answered. "I've enjoyed seeing you so much."

"I'm pleased to have met you, Foster, and I wish you both a blessed Christmastide."

Days passed, and it was Christmas. Bright and early came a special delivery letter.

"Dearest Helen," it began. "I have the grandest news for you! As soon as I got home I phoned to Jud Myers in New York. He's staging a new show that I'm designing the costumes for and has been simply wild for some act to put in the heart throbs.

"Well, I talked him into seeing that a bling singer would go over big, and raved about Foster's voice, so it's all arranged. I am enclosing his check for $500, and if you can be ready we'll all go back to New York together.

"With love for a Merry Christmas Pauline."

News of Minnesota

EVENTS of the week throughout the "State of Ten Thousand Lakes" told in brief form

Marshall—The annual poultry show of the Lyon County Poultry Association was held here.

Montevideo—Christmas decoration lights were turned on here and all garlands and wreaths were made by local unemployed.

Parkers Lake—Dr. S. O. Lockwood, superintendent of the Minneapolis workhouse for 14 years, died of heart disease at his home here. He was 63.

Hill City—Dorothy Eller, 16, high school junior here, was selected as the healthiest girl in the U. S. out of 950,000 4-H contestants at Chicago recently.

St. Paul—Sub-zero weather brought the temperature down to 12 below here for a new 1932 mark. The coldest spot in the state was Hibbing with 30 below.

Red Wing—The city clerk received an application for a license to sell beer. The letter informed him that the writer wanted to get in on the ground floor.

Fertile—Fire destroyed the local theater with a loss of $10,000. Twenty-eight volunteer firemen kept the blaze from spreading to the telephone exchange and a three-story hotel.

Lake Elmo—Captured when he sought treatment for a bullet wound in his hand, Joseph Sullivan of Lake Elmo, confessed to the recent robbery of the State Bank at Bay City, Wisc.

Two Harbors—What is claimed as the largest bear ever killed in this section of Minnesota, weighing between 600 and 700 pounds, was shot here by Conrad Floathe of Two Harbors.

Hopkins—Damage estimated at $25,000 was done by fire which swept through a garage. Volunteer firemen using the two Hopkins pumpers were able to confine the flames to the one structure.

Milaca—Hunters who failed to observe game laws of Minnesota contributed $932 to the state game and fish department, besides losing 28 deer either taken illegally or shipped improperly.

St. Paul—A complete shakeup of the state highway department, involving all of its administrative heads, will result from Governor Olson's dismissal of Charles M. Babcock, highway commissioner.

Moorhead—Choice of A. C. Smith of Minneapolis as the judge and of January 12 to 14 as the dates for the Red River Valley live poultry and turkey show was announced by officers of the Clay County Poultry association.

Faribault—In a move to aid jobless, the city council voted to construct a sewer project to serve as a relief main. The project had been planned for some time but will be undertaken this winter to provide additional employment.

St. Paul—Construction of a new state reformatory for first offenders, making the present reformatory at St. Cloud a second major penal institution corresponding to Stillwater prison, was recommended by the state board of control.

Minneapolis—Dave Bancroft, famous National League shortstop and manager, signed a one-year contract with President Mike Kelley to pilot the Minneapolis American Association club, succeeding Donie Bush, who has gone to Cincinnati.

St. Paul—Working hours will be shortened and pay scales increased next year as the major change in highway department policies Governor Floyd B. Olson announced following the appointment of N. W. Elsberg as highway commissioner.

Fergus Falls—Two large buildings here, the Riverside flats and the old Lyceum theater, burned to the ground. Several other buildings, including a nurses' home were damaged in the same fire. The fire was in the heart of the business district and destroyed firms and offices to the extent of $100,000.

Windom—The county assessor plan was voted down at district taxpayers meeting here. Fifty or sixty assessors and county commissioners from the counties of Rock, Jackson, Nobles, Brown, Redwood, Murray and Cottonwood were at the meeting and a general discussion of tax problems was carried on.

Wabasha—Twelve-year-old Leonard Thorpe, described by his school teacher as a very good boy, shot and killed his stepfather, Miko Hiddleston, 70, of Plainview. He said he did it to save his mother from beatings.

St. Paul—Mrs. Jean W. Wittich, state budget commissioner, will propose a $6,000,000 cut in state expenses in the coming legislature. As far as appropriations are concerned, she said, the legislature should be able to clear up its work early and adjourn in 60 days, instead of the usual 90.

SHAKESPEARE NOT "KEEN" ON MOTHERS

Comparatively Few Found in His Works.

The Shakespeare plays are not so often seen upon the stage as of yore, but there are many who still read and enjoy them. Did it ever occur to you how many motherless girls flit through his pages? I recall Miranda, Portia and Nerissa, Rosalind and Celia, Viola and Olivia, Beatrice, Ophelia, Imogen, Julia and Sylvia, Katherine the Shrew, Cordelia, Desdemona, all motherless—not named however, in the order of their importance in my list of book friends.

In proportion to the number of girls without visible mothers, the mothers portrayed are few and far between. We know so little of Shakespeare's life that we have no way of telling whether he had any living models of motherhood. Mary Arden, with ten children to look after, may have given little of herself to William; Anne Hathaway, left for years alone in Stratford, had to work out her own methods of mothering to which William, in far away London, was probably a stranger, though we know that he returned on occasion—once to his son Hamnet's funeral.

The few mothers who come to mind, briefly outlined are these: Volumnia, the typical Roman matron, who would rather see her son lying dead than know that Coriolanus had betrayed his country; Elizabeth Grey, wife of Edward IV, leaving her two little sons imprisoned in the tower, by order of Richard III, looking back and crying out:

Stay, yet look back with me unto the tower:
Pity, you ancient stones, those tender babes,
Whom envy hath immured within your walls;
Rough cradle for such little pretty ones,
Rude, rugged nurse, old sullen playfellow
For tender princes.

Constance contrasts with Elinor, the crafty mother of King John, the "evil genius of England." Constance, mourning the death of little Arthur, exclaimed in her agony:

Grief fills the room up of my absent child;
Lies in his bed, walks up and down with me;
Puts on his pretty looks, repeats his words,
Remembers me of all his gracious parts;
Stuffs out his vacant garments with his form.
Then have I reason to be fond of grief.

Isabel, queen of France, who thinks a woman's voice may do some good when articles too nicely urged be stood on, left King Hal to execute that charming wooing of Katherine, in his broken French. The frailty of Gertrude, the queen mother of Hamlet, ruined his life and was the cause of all the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune, that nearly wrecked his reason.

Hermione, clear-eyed and quiet, the victim of inexcusable jealousy on the part of her husband, lived to be reunited to her daughter Perdita, one of the loveliest of Shakespeare's girls; Lady Capulet, a mere figurehead, a one-track mind reached out to a wealthy marriage for Juliet and social prestige for herself. We must not forget the mother of "sweet Anne Page" who, like many other mothers, had chosen a husband for her in the person of Doctor Caius who could not compete with William Fenton whom Anne loved and married. Perhaps some of the mothers have been left out but there still are enough to prove my point that the motherless girls outnumbered the mothers in Shakespeare's plays.—M. O. W., in the Indianapolis News.

British Build Sea Wall to End Ocean's Ravages

Not since the Romans built their great fortification from the Tyne to Solway firth has such a wall been built in Britain as one under construction today.

The new wall has a very different purpose from the ancient one. It is a defense not against human foes, but against the sea. All along the east coast the sea is continually disturbing the contour of the land. Kings Lynn was at one time one of the busy ports of the country, and it has fallen from its high place because the sea has blocked the River Ouse with millions of tons of sand and has threatened to overflow its banks and transform the country into a marsh land. To remedy this, already much engineering work has been done, and a wall is being constructed to carry the river four miles out to sea.

It made the whole

And then it
burned me.

Unexpected Surprises Welcomed at Christmas

DOROTHY sat huddled disconsolately in the big arm chair before the grate fire. To have tonsils out just before Christmas was bad enough, but to be waiting for a sweetheart and to know that there was a forwarded letter in another girl's handwriting, also awaiting him was much worse.

"Hello, Dot," in breezed Jack, all joy and Christmas gaiety. He leaned over and kissed her tenderly:

"You poor kid. It's sure tough, at Christmas, too."

Dorothy smiled wanly and pointed to the letter on the table.

"Who the deuce?" Jack slit the envelope, glanced over it and thrust it into his pocket. "Why waste time reading your letters when I've got you—but it was sure good of you to have Mary write me."

Dorothy's eyes brightened and her throat seemed almost well. What a goose she was to have forgotten that she had asked Mary to write Jack and tell him how she was. What a wonderful time Christmas was with its unexpected surprises!—Florence Harris Wells.

Complete Election Returns

The largest vote in the nation's history was cast in the November presidential election—39,734,351.

With this record were established three others Franklin D. Roosevelt received the highest popular and electorial votes ever given a winning candidate and President Hoover pooled the largest popular vote ever for a loser.

Here's the way the votes were distributed: Roosevelt, 22,813,786; Hoover, 15,759,266; and the presidential candidates, 1,161,299.

Final returns as certified by state officials and compiled by the associated press Saturday showed the total vote, when compared with the previous record of 36,798,669 in 1928, to have increased 2,935,682 or 7.9 per cent.

Roosevelt's plurality was 7,054,520. This exceeds Hoover's plurality of 6,423,612 over Alfred E. Smith four years ago, but fell short of the record plurality of 6,338,513 polled by Calvin Coolidge over John W. Davis in 1924.

The minor party vote more than triplod that of 1928. Norman Thomas, the Socialist candidate for president led the field with 881,951, which compared with his 267,835 four years ago and nearly equaled the record for a Socialist candidate—919,799 for Eugene Debs in 1920.

The 77,528 vote polled by William D. Upshaw as the Prohibition party candidate was the largest given this ticket since the first election after national prohibition was adopted. It was nearly four times the 1928 vote.

Roosevelt carried 42 states; Hoover won in Connecticut, Delaware, Maine, New Hampshire, Pennsylvanian and Vermont. Texas gave the Democratic candidate the largest plurality—656,622; New York the second largest with 596,996.

New Tax Levy In County Will Total $598,000

Taxes levied in Marshall county for all purposes and from all sources this year and payable during 1933 will total $598,808.50, according to figures released today in the official abstract of tax levies completed in the office of Levi G. Johnson, county auditor. The direct levy totals $502,607.56.

While assessed valuations for the county decreased in the neighborhood of two million dollars, reductions in tax levies by local governments made possible only a slight increase in the average tax rates for the year, the average rate increasing only 4.23 mills the report shows. Last year the average rate for the county was 66.56 mills while this year the average rate is 70.79 mills.

On the basis of the average tax rates for this year, the state rate is 8.25 mills and will receive 11.7 per cent of the taxes levied in the county. The county rate of 18.25 mills will give the county 25.8 per cent of the taxes levied. The average township and village rate is 12.83 mills and they will receive 18.1 per cent of the total levy while the school average rate is 31.46 mills and will receive 44.4 per cent of the taxes.

In 1931 the state rate was 7.88 mills or 12 per cent of the total levy and the county rate was 18.5 mills or 28 per cent of the total levy. The township and village average rate was 12.61 mills or 19 per cent of the levy while the schools' average rate was 27.57 mills or 41 per cent of the total tax levy.

Townships of the county will pay $375,612.48 and the city and villages $126,995.08 of the total levy in the county during 1933, while special assessments in the county total $91,006.04. Grain taxes in the county total $578.80, Money and Credits taxes total $1,806.19 and power and light company taxes total $2,804.91, making the grand total reach $598,803.50.

The moneys to be raised in Marshall county during the coming year will be used for the following purposes:

Minnesota Crops Increase

The 1932 season resulted in a total production of principal crops approximately 34 per cent larger than the low production of last year according to the agricultural statisticans in Saint Paul. The corn crop this year is the largest ever produced in this state.

The total acreage harvested for the twelve crops was 14,269,100 acres yielding 448,831,300 bushels, compared with 14,392,900 acres harvested last year with a yield of 335,225,400 bushels. In addition 25,000 bags of beans were produced, slightly less than last year; also 660,000 pounds of tobacco, about one-fourth of last year's production, due to reduced acreage and 3,699,000 tons of tame hay, as well as 1,865,000 tons of wild hay. Apple production totaled 660,000 bushels or about one-half of last year's crop while grape production was 327 tons.

Except for the dry area in north central Minnesota, comprising eight counties, practically all sections of the state have a very ample supply of feed. This is in contrast with last year's situation when practically all sections experienced a feed shortage.

License Receipts 10 Million

A total of $10,041,281 was collected by the motor vehicle division on 706,137 motor vehicle registrations up to December 1 of this year Secretary of State Mike Holm has announced.

For the same period in 1931, 739,251 registrations were recorded on which $10,695,342 was collected. The total for the year 1931 was 740,442 pair of license plates for a total revenue of $10,720,789.

Death of Olaus Rodahl

The people of this community were shocked on Tuesday to hear of the death of Olaus Rodahl who passed away at his farm home southeast of here on Tuesday morning at 8:30. Mr. Rodahl, a pioneer in this community was in town on Friday and looked after business matters as usual but, after he came home that night he took sick and the doctor pronounced the cause of his death was brain fever.

Funeral services will be held from the Nazareth Lutheran church here on Saturday at 1 o'clock with Rev. L. M. Redal officiating. Interment will be made in the Holt cemetery.

Marshall Co. Poultry Show

The seventh annual Marshall county poultry show will be held at Warren January 5, 6, and 7, J. O. Allen of Radium, secretary of the poultry association announced yesterday. In former years the event had been held in February. The building on East Johnson ave, next door to the East Side Grocery will be the scene of the show. George W. Hackett of Wayzata, editor of the American Turkey Breeder, and general manager of the All-American Turkey show at Grand Forks, will judge the exhibits.

Anyone wishing to exhibit should write to J. O. Allen at Radium for copies of the premium lists and entry blanks.

Drivers of Horse-Drawn Vehicles Given Warning

A warning against driving horse drawn vehicles without lights at night, or parking any unlighted vehicles on the highway, was issued this week by the patrol division of the Minnesota Highway department. Failure to observe these simple precautions has resulted in a number of serious accidents in the last few weeks.

Driving horse drawn vehicles without lights on a highway at night, parking any vehicle at any time wholly or partly on the paved or traveled portion of a highway, and parking or driving any vehicle at night without light—are all punishable by fine or jail sentence, if a traffic officer comes along at the right time. But if some one else than a patrolmen comes along, the penalty may be more severe, a wrecked car, a dead horse, or a human being killed or maimed for life. It pays to know the law and obey it.

NUDIST CULT SHUTS DOWN FOR WINTER

Members Already Lay Plans for Next Summer.

New York.—New Jersey's more or less famous Sky farms' nudist colony—an aggregation of "the original, noncommercial nudists of the United States"—has shut up shop for the winter—going into hibernation, as it were. Officials of the organization want it known, however, that whatever capitulation the news may suggest to biased minds the reason is the rigors of the new season and not to the conventionalities of society. Indeed, the members are just as much nudists at heart and by inclination as ever, it is stated, and the new spring will find them holding forth in their original birthday suits as defiantly as ever at the same old stand.

Some attempt will be made to carry on through the winter—in fact, a Manhattan gymnasium has been rented by the society and here a half a hundred men and women of the colony plan to gather two nights a week to swim and work off by calisthenics the avoirdupois that mars a perfect nudist.

Will Wear Bathing Suits.

Because "it is no use taking any chances," according to Carl Becker, founder and secretary of the organization, they wear bathing suits. But Sky farms, their 30-acre camp near Liberty Corners, N. J., is open all year, and though members go there through the winter chiefly to get out in the country, on warm days the hardier ones do a little nude sun bathing.

The Sky farms nudists are incorporated in New Jersey as the American League for Physical Culture. They have only pity for the rival nudists of the Olympian league, and although Camp Olympia, which flourished last summer near Highland, N. Y., had 400 acres and its own private lake, they consider that it was "commercial from the outset."

"We are the oldest and the biggest nudist organization," said Mr. Becker, a German in the importing and exporting business. "We are a private club, equally for the benefit of all members. Nobody makes any money. We don't admit the press even when reporters are willing to go nudist, too. Naturally we want our idea to spread, but it can't go like wildfire. We have to educate the public, but we also have to look out for the privacy of our members."

The group has 220 members in the metropolitan district, Mr. Becker said: it would be more than 500 if the depression had not caused many to drop out. Asked why the depression would affect a cult which means less wear and tear on clothes, Mr. Becker laughed gently and said there were dues to pay and the matter of railroad fare to Liberty Corners.

"Our purpose is the promotion of cleaner relations between the sexes by eliminating perhaps the greatest evil of western civilization, sex curiosity," he went on. "This can be done by bringing both sexes together in a perfect state of nudity, providing the proper place can be found—a secluded farm where all kinds of sports, swimming, and general camp life can be indulged in.

Build Own Quarters.

Mr. Becker founded the league three years ago after a visit to Germany, where he "got the idea." That summer the nudists camped out in the Catskills. Since then they have had rented farms in New Jersey and in Rockland county, N. Y. Police descended on the latter, but the nudists were freed in court.

Last winter, with the treasury comfortably full, they bought the plot of dense woods, with running brook at Liberty Corners. In May they moved out in tents; by July 4 they had built with their own hands most of a dormitory with sleeping accommodations for 48. Now they have just finished a swimming pool. An architect and several carpenters among the membership led in the building operations. A plumber member put up an outdoor shower for use until the pool was finished.

There are also 12 bungalows which members built themselves on plots they rented from the league for from $10 to $25 a year, and several jobless nudists are living in their bungalows all winter. Next year they plan a social hall, tennis courts, an archery field and other facilities for sports, and a restaurant. At present cooking is done camp fashion.

Would-be members are looked over by a membership committee which is so adept that in three years only four persons have been expelled. "They did not do anything, they were just uncongenial," Mr. Becker said, and the rules are even stricter now. No one is admitted to the camp until the membership committee has approved, then the applicant is taken out to Sky Farms for a week-end, and if he likes it his membership is assured.

Blind Inmate of County Farm Elected to Office

Pierre, S. D.—Among the vagaries of the Democrtic landslide in Bon Homme county of this state was the election to the post of state's attorney of a man who is blind and has been an inmate of the county farm for a number of years. His name was put on to fill out the ticket, and he won. He was at one time a practicing lawyer, but after he lost his sight he repaired to the county farm, and had been there since.

In Badlee county a resident of Iowa was elected to the position of coroner. After filing his candidacy he left the state and established residence in Iowa, but as no withdrawal was entered the name went on the ballot and was voted for along with the other candidates of the nominating party.

In many South Dakota counties names were placed upon the Democratic ballot "just to fill out" as the party had never been known to carry counties in which no really strong candidate came forward. But this year the landslide carried them in, weak and strong, and the old-time Democrats who always had a desire for office, but who declined to have their names presented, are now wishing they could have looked a little further into the future.

Cholera Takes Heavy Toll in China Epidemic

Peiping, China.—Cholera took a terrific toll in China during the summer of 1932, according to the bureau of public health.

Dr. J. Heng Liu, the director of the bureau, is authority for the statement that, while official reports from various provinces give notification of 50,000 cholera cases, the correct figure may be accepted as having passed the 100,000 mark. Doctor Liu believes that during the summer more than 30,000 persons died of cholera.

Cholera first appeared in Shanghai, spread to Nanking and advanced to other cities on the Yangtze river. Cases soon were reported in both north and south China. The situation in Shansi, Shensi, Honan and Suiyuan provinces was so severe that all railway traffic was suspended.

SURVEY PROVES YOUTH IS NOT "GOING TO THE DOGS"

Figures Show Juvenile Delinquency Decreasing.

Washington.—Figures do not justify the conclusion that juvenile delinquency is on the increase, according to a recent report of the National Education association which has just completed an investigation of the truth of the oft-repeated assertion that youth is "going to the dogs."

Reports from several of the large cities including Chicago and New York do not indicate that delinquency has grown faster than the population. In fact, the number of delinquent boys per thousand population has decreased by one-half during the past twenty years in New York, where there were 85,000 boys brought before the Children's court from 1902 to 1911, and only 64,000 in the decade just closed. The total number of juvenile delinquents brought before courts each year in the United States has been estimated at approximately 200,000.

Juvenile delinquency seems to be closely associated with certain environmental and hereditary factors, though no agreement exists as to the relative weight of them in contributing to the waywardness of youth. The economic uncertainty and lack of control in broken homes, are very frequent factors. Older children who are delinquents often lead younger children into crime. Neighborhoods in which the population frequently changes seem to lose those social controls that reduce delinquency. Street trades and other employments of juveniles either tend to attract or develop delinquent children.

A summary of surveys of delinquency shows that certain personal factors such as race, nativity, sex, age, intelligence, and physical condition have a bearing upon delinquency. There is a larger proportion of negro children appearing before the courts than might be expected. Homes in which one or both parents are foreign-born seem to supply more than their share of juvenile court cases. Boys who face the juvenile judge outnumber girls more than five to one.

Any delinquency is recognized as too much. The study shows that the following efforts among others, are being made toward a still further reduction of delinquency. State laws provide for 24-hour-a-day parental schools; special day schools for truants and incorrigibles are being established in many cities; special classes, behavior clinics, mental hygiene, educational and vocational guidance, education in the wise use of leisure, and in character, are now part of the regular routine in hundreds of schools where the objective is the prevention of delinquency rather than the cure of it.

London Drug Turns Sap Into a Samson

London.—The age of the superman is near, according to research workers at a London hospital who have discovered a new drug for which they make the following claims:

It will prolong life, eliminate fear, breed courage and stimulate the intellectual and physical strength.

It will make sheep as strong as oxen and cats as ferocious as panthers. Already sheep and cats treated with the drug have fought and killed dogs.

It will add ten years to the average span of life and produce a race of supermen.

Lawsuit Reveals Horse's Victory Over Motor Car

Nashville, Tenn.—A contest between a horse and an automobile turned out more or less of a victory for the horse, according to a suit filed here.

Ralph Harter, seeking $5,000 damages from L. F. Watkins, charged that he was a passenger in a car when it overtook Watkins' daughter twelve years old, astride a horse belonging to Watkins.

The girl pulled over to the right hand side of the road. Harter said the car was moving slowly by the horse when the latter backed into the vehicle, its weight crushing in the side and door. Harter says his elbow and three ribs were broken. The horse was not hurt.

Cote, farmer living near here, saw dark clouds approaching as he worked in the field. Deciding to quit work, he started driving his team home.

Suddenly he remembered leaving his coat in the field. He went back for it, leaving the horses. In his momentary absence a lightning bolt struck the team. Three horses were killed. Cote received only a slight shock.

A Toast to the New Year

RESOLUTIONS BROKEN

BY MARIE MARSH

BOB JUDSON went down to breakfast New Year's morning with his shirt cuffs dangling. He had watched the old year out and the new year in at his young sister's party and had promised to go skating with the "crowd" by nine in the morning.

"What in thunder do you mean by swiping my cuff buttons, Peggy?" he said to his sister.

"Only this," cooed Peggy, who was eighteen and uncommonly pretty. She held up her hands, showing the cuffs of a blouse of masculine cut. "I needed them, dearie, so before you were awake I came in and got them. Don't be huffy, sweetheart, it's New Year's day."

"Well, you needn't be so absurdly good-natured," growled Bob.

"No, dearest!" said Peggy. "But it's New Year's day and I've made some resolutions. One's to be very good-natured. And I'm beginning on you. I have made out some for you, too," she added.

Not to flirt.

Not to be scrappy.

Note to be late for dinner—"It annoys cook so."

Not to be hoggish—This had special reference to neckties, fountain pens, cuff buttons, etc.

Not to get engaged before the next New Year's day. "Because unattached men are scarce and we need you in the bunch to piece out with."

"Bobby, dear," resumed Peggy, "I've asked some of the girls to come in this evening to practice a new dance step. We're a man short. That is we are a girl extra. Sally's bringing her cousin," she continued.

Bob's social engagements in his own and his sister's set kept him until darkness had begun to settle. But, as he reflected, it was only half past five, and with half an hour to get home and dinner at half past six, he would be in good time. He could boast to Peggy that he had kept all his resolutions at least for the day.

He was aware of the fact that there was a young woman walking hurriedly beside a man on the opposite side of the street. Then he saw the young woman quickly cross the street. She waved her hand and fairly pounced upon him with a "Why, Marmaduke, dear, how glad I am to see you!"

Tom remembered the first resolution given by Peggy, "Not to flirt."

"I thought it was you, Marmaduke," said the girl, walking beside him and laughing gayly. "Of course, you were on your way to our house. We half expected you, but I didn't know you would come this way." It seemed to Tom that the girl was talking very loudly. And then in an aside she said, "Marmaduke Butler's your name."

Then Tom realized that the man who had been talking to the girl had caught up with them.

"Say, who are you?" said the young man, well dressed, but with his hat drawn over his eyes.

"Why, I'm Marmaduke Butler," stammered Tom.

"I don't believe it," snarled the stranger. "We don't neither of us know her. And I came along first."

Tom did not wait to know what was coming next. He shook off the girl's hold, his fists clenched and his muscles tightened without volition. The next minute he had struck out toward the annoying stranger, and with the third blow the stranger was prone on the path.

"Take me home," whispered the girl, hoarsely. "It's 26 Bedford street. Can you find it?" They hurried on. The man was soon following them again as they proceeded.

Tom stood with her on the porch of the house marked 26 until a servant came to the door. "May I see you again?"

"Oh, no," said the girl. "It would seem as if I had been very impertinent if we ever met again. But I shall always be grateful." Then the door closed and Tom in much confusion traced his steps homeward. It was a quarter to seven when he reached home.

"Tom, you have broken one of your resolutions the first thing," chirped Peggy.

"I've broken more than one," said Tom dismally. "I've flirted with a girl, knocked a man over, I've felt as if I wanted something all to myself, and if I get half a chance I'll be engaged before next year. Say, Peggy, Sally lives somewhere in Bedford street, doesn't she?"

"Twenty-six," said Peggy. "And I shouldn't wonder if you'd better remember that, because you'll have to see Sally's cousin home. You see, she's the extra girl tonight."

Then the telephone bell rang and Peggy was absorbed for many minutes. She burst in upon Tom in the dining room, where he was finishing dinner alone. "Tom, hurry. I am afraid you'll have to get Sally and her cousin. Burton James was going to meet them here and they were coming alone, but the cousin—Madge is her name—had the most awful experience, perfectly awful. A man followed her. They walked along and then he took her arm, wanted to make a date with her and everything. Madge didn't know what to do, it was so dark and lonely. But she says the nicest man came along and saw her difficulty and knocked the man down and took her home, then left without letting her know who he was. Wasn't that splendid? Now the girls are afraid to come alone for fear that other man will meet them."

Of course, Tom hastened to 26 Bedford street, and of course the affair ripened into a romance, and long before the year was out announcements were made of the engagement of Madge and Tom.

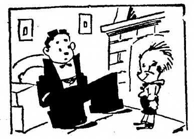
LUCKY GIRL



George—"I suppose your sister has forgotten me, hasn't she?" Johnny—"I guess not." George—"Why, does she ever speak of me?" Johnny—"Sure. Only dis mornin' she spoke of how lucky it was she shook you when she did."

Stumped the Professor

The old maids were pestering a professor who resides in a quiet part of town behind the protection of an unpublished telephone number.

"But, professor," they persisted, "doesn't anything ever puzzle you?"

The professor, who knew everything and was a gentleman, nevertheless became only human under all the hammering of the gay old things.

"Why, yes, there is," he said, smiling. "If exercise is supposed to reduce fat, why do so many women have double chins?"—New York Sun.

The Black Box of Silence

SYNOPSIS

Owen Landis, young inventor, has developed an extraordinary "silencer," which is stolen from a safe in his laboratory. Landis tells Wally Markham, his chum, the only person, beside himself, knowing the combination of the safe, is Betty Lawson, with whom the inventor is in love. A plaster cast of a woman's footprint, found beneath the window of the laboratory, fits one of Betty's shoes. Betty tells Markham Herbert Canby, posing as a "promoter," had driven her home the previous night, and that she had dozed in the car. The safe in the bank at Perthdale is blown open and looted, the noise of the explosion being unheard. Satisfied that his "black box" is in the hands of crooks, Landis, with Markham, goes to Perthdale. Three strangers, claiming to be business men of Louisville, are the only possible suspects. Markham and Landis decide to follow them. At St. Joseph Markham learns Canby is driving west, with Betty Lawson and her father as guests in the car. Markham's car is stolen and wrecked. He buys another, and they go on. At Copah they meet Betty who explains the reason for her and her father's journey. A conversation between Canby and the three Louisville men convinces Markham and Landis they are on the right track. The commissary of the Cinnabar mine is robbed and two men killed. Again there was no sound. At Brewster they learn of the arrival of Canby and his party. William Starbuck, mine owner, tells them of Canby's crookedness. They meet Canby. He tells them he is in the West on business connected with his mine, the "Old Quavapai." Betty and her father are with him as guests. Landis and Markham are assaulted on the street by knife wielders, but beat off their assailants.

"If you are out on the Topaz road, stop at the Little Alice. I'm going out there shortly."

The invitation was accepted, conditioned upon their driving that far.

As they were taking the roadster out of the hotel garage Landis asked what was to be the program for the day.

"I want to take a shot at trying to find out what Canby did with those two unaccounted-for hours yesterday morning."

The "shot" was fired methodically by making inquiries on all the roads leading out of Brewster, and it led to nothing until the round brought them to the road over which they themselves had driven in. Here, at a cottage, Markham stopped the car, saying, "There was a light in this house when we came by yesterday morning; I noticed it. It's only another of the wild chances; but we'll ask."

"Pardon me, but we'll be grateful if you would answer a few questions for us, if you can. You were up early yesterday morning, weren't you?"

The woman nodded. "I was—all of that. My baby was sick."

"Do you often notice the passing of cars?"

"I couldn't very well help it, could I—living that close to the road like this?" Then, pointing to the roadster, "I saw that car, or one just like it, go by a little after day, yesterday morning."

"Quite right; and we were in it. Was it the only one you saw?"

"No, there were three more; big cars, all just alike. Two going into town, and one coming out. I was sitting by the window."

"Could you—can you remember the times when these three cars, just alike, went past?" he asked.

"Not just; but I sh'd say it was somewhere near three o'clock when the first one went by, going on to town."

"Could you see this big car well enough to tell us how it looked?"

"It was a fine, closed car, painted a kind of light yellow; a limmyzeen, they call 'em, don't they?"

Markham nodded. "I suppose you couldn't see the people in it, could you?"

"Only that there was two of 'em in the front seat; a man and a woman."

"Exactly. Now the next one; when did it come along?"

"Maybe a half hour or so after that. It was going the other way. It looked like the same car. Anyway, it was the same color."

"And the third one; which way was it going?"

"It was going in, and it was a big, yellow car, too, just like the others. I saw it good."

"Could you see the folks in it?"

"I could see only the one man, driving."

"An extraordinarily good witness, that woman," Markham commented, when they drove on; adding, "That was a happy thought of yours, Owen—timing those three cars. Where does it land you?"

"I think you know. The three cars just alike were one and the same car. And the man driving it all three times was Canby."

"Check! The next question is, why did he double back after he had left the professor and Betty at the hotel?"

"Wait," said Landis; and after a brow-knitting pause, "I'm trying to remember. Coming over last night you repeated for me the talk you overheard between Canby and the three in the Copah garage. Didn't you say something about Canby's meeting the others, as agreed?"

"You've got it! He did say just that. That's why the Fleetwing hasn't shown up in Brewster; they've left it somewhere along the road, and Canby picked them up and brought them in. We're framing the puzzle up, a bit at a time. I—hello—here we are at the Little Alice. Shall we stop?"

"Have to, won't we? If Mr. Starbuck sees us, he'll think it queer if we drive past without stopping."

Markham parked the car, and as he was doing it, Starbuck came out.

"You are just in the nick of time to have a noon snack with us," was the mine owner's greeting. "Come on over to the mess shack and meet the staff."

This was their introduction to the engineers' and officer men's mess; and after the meal Starbuck took them in hand and showed them through the mine.

After they had tramped for what seemed like miles in the network, Starbuck halted them in a well-lighted heading where the chattering clamor of the air drills was deafening; and the silence, when the drills stopped, and the miners began to unlimber and drag them back from the heading, was almost painful.

"This is our main lead," Starbuck explained, when the stoppage of the drill clamor gave him leave, "It's what the old miners call a 'true fissure' vein, and they have a belief that such veins grow richer the deeper you drive." Then, "They are aiming to load the holes and fire, and we'd better move out."

As they were walking down the main tunnel, Landis said, "You spoke of the old-time miners; do they have many superstitions?"

"Oh, not more than men of other callings, I reckon. But in that heading we've just left, we've had a curious case of 'miner's nerves.' The men began to say they could hear the ticking of a 'death watch' when the drills stopped. We didn't pay any attention to it at first; but after a while, when the men in that heading began to take time off on one excuse or another, we investigated. The ticking could be heard at times, but it was probably only the trickling of water in some underground cavity, or so we concluded."

"Talk Fast and Talk Straight, If You Want to Go On Living!"

As they came out of the mine, Markham asked the location of the Quavapai. Starbuck pointed up the road toward Lake Topaz.

"It's on the other side of the spur in the next gulch. If you are going that way, you'll see the dump as you pass the mouth of the gulch."

They saw it, hanging like a huge gray beard from the mountain side, but a turn in the gulch hid the mine buildings. The side road was barricaded against traffic, and beyond the barricade they saw a man with a gun.

"What do you make of that?" Landis asked.

"No visitors need apply. I wonder what Canby has up his sleeve in there?"

"Time may tell. What do we do now. Go on hunting for the Fleetwing?"

Markham made a sign of assent. "I'd like to know where those three men left it, and why. Also, why Canby went out to meet them."

They stopped at the hotel to glance over the register in search of the three names Markham had copied from the record in St. Joseph. The names did not appear, and, as they were driving out of the hotel grounds they met Canby driving in, not in the yellow limousine, but in a sport roadster. The other occupant of the single seat was Betty Lawson. Canby seemed not to see them, but Betty did and she waved to them.

"You see," said Landis gloomily.

"I see that you are taking it lying down," Markham returned in a half growl.

"You think I wouldn't break in if I had an opening—that I don't care enough? Good Lord, Wally, I'd give the best ten years of my life if I could go back to where I stood with Betty before I began to bury myself in this cursed invention of mine!" He choked up at that, and when he went on, "Show me an opening, Wally, and I'll walk into it if h—l is gaping on the other side of it! That's how much I'm taking it lying down!"

"Um; that sounds more like it," was Markham's gruff approval, and he drove on.

Before they had gone far, Landis, looking back, saw a small car following; a car that was apparently having trouble making the grades, since, however slowly they drove, it never overtook them. After a time Landis spoke of the struggling flivver.

"That Lizzie seems to be making hard work of it," he said, when, on one of the reverse loopings, they could see it across the intervening gulch. It was stopped, and two men were apparently doing something to the motor.

Markham gave the halted car only a passing glance. "This is the gulch where we saw the fire night before last," he pointed out. "Suppose we climb down there and have a look."

They got out and scotched the wheels with stones. The descent into the gulch was down a precipitous slope. Before they had gone very far they came upon what appeared to be a rough trail, with crushed and broken bushes to mark its course.

"What's been happening here?" Landis asked. "More rock rolling?"

"Looks like it; we'll find out when we get to the bottom."

At the bottom of the gulch they found themselves in a boulder-strewn stream bed, and, turning to the left, they struggled upward toward the place where they had seen the fire. It was in a dry stream bed that they came suddenly upon the thing they were searching for—the remains of the fire. Wedged in the bottom of the gulch was the wreck of a large car crushed into a shapeless heap of junk, and with everything burnable blackened and destroyed.

"Now we know what made the scarred trail," said Markham. "That car ran off the road and came down here and burned up. Is it the Fleetwing?"

Before Landis could reply, there came a vicious spat on the face of the rock beside which they were standing, followed by the crack of a rifle. They ducked behind the boulder, and at that there was another report and the clang of a bullet upon the iron work of the wrecked car.

"What the—?" Markham choked, grabbing for his pistol. But Landis was cooler.

"Easy," he counseled. "It's those fellows up at the flivver. Don't waste your ammunition. The automatic won't carry half that far."

"No trouble about getting out of it, with all these rocks to dodge around."

Worming their way cautiously among the boulders, they were soon out of range from the road above, though the unseen rifleman kept on firing, but the bullets went wild. After they reached a hollow that was out of sight from the marksman's position, Markham looked apprehensively at the bare slope they would have to climb to reach their car.

"We'll have to go farther," he panted. "We can't scramble up there in plain sight."

"I don't mean to," said Landis. Then, in a sudden upblaze of passion, "I've had about enough of this d—d ambushing business, haven't you? There is good cover on this other side of the gulch. We'll climb out that way and see if we can't do a little of the ambushing ourselves!"

As he had pointed out, there was foresting enough on the western slope of the gulch to afford fairly well-concealed stalking cover, and as they toiled up through the undergrowth, Markham was striving to flog his estimate of his boyhood chum and college mate around to the new point of view. He had always thought of Landis as a dreamer, a thinker, a student—as anything but a fighting man.

But here was an entirely new development. The dreamer, pale of face, to be sure, but with his jaw outthrust and the light of battle in his wideset gray eyes, was storming up the steep ascent at a pace that made his heavier follower pant and blow. Thus it came about that Landis was the first to step out of a thick growth of little spruces at the level of the road. Markham burst out of the cover a moment later, and what he saw was a further proof that a lifelong friendship may not reveal the whole man, even to his closest intimate.

The small, dusty, rattletrap car was standing as they had seen it from the opposite side of the gulch. Beside it were two men with their hands above their heads in deference to Landis' covering pistol, and at their feet lay the rifle with which one of them had been firing into the gulch. Before Markham could get his breath, Landis was grilling the pair snappily.

"What did you fellows mean by firing at us when we were down there? Talk fast and talk straight, if you want to go on living!"

"G-g-great Scott!" stuttered the taller of the two. "Are ye meanin' to s-say hit was you-all down yonder in the gully?"

"You know d—d well it was! What's your game? Who sent you here to kill us off? Talk quick!"

"'Fore Gawd, mister, you got us all wrong! We ain't aimin' to kill nobody! I thort you was a b'ar; so help me, I did! They told us, down along, that we might meet up with a b'ar comin' through these mountains, and when we looked down yonder, we shore thort you-all wuz one, didn't we, Jeff?" appealing to his mate. "Good gravy! You don't reckon we'd shoot at a man, knowin' it wuz a man, do ye?"

"We're from Tennessee. Been to Utah, seein' if hit wuz a fittin' country for white folks. Hit ain't, and we're aimin' to go back where we come from."

"Did you stop in Brewster?"

"Didn't stop only long enough to buy us some grub."

News of Minnesota

EVENTS of the week throughout the "State of Ten Thousand Lakes" told in brief form

Tracy—The Tracy Red Cross chapter has received 160 sacks of flour for distribution to the needy of this section.

Wells—Fire leveled the local public school building while firemen labored in 15 below zero weather to control the flames.

Anoka—Retirement of L. O. Jacob as Anoka county agent January 1 will mark the completion of 15 years service in that field.

St. Paul—Minnesota ranks eighth among states in the mileage of extra wide pavements, according to figures compiled by the U. S. bureau of public roads.

New Prague—John J. Simon, 50 years old, was accidentally killed while hunting on his farm near here. A widow, nine children and two brothers survive.

Minneapolis — Lieutenant Governor Henry Arens suffered a sprained knee and minor bruises and scratches when he was knocked down by an automobile in Minneapolis.

Minneapolis—Albert Carpenter Loring, 74, president of the Pillsbury Flour Mills Co., and a director of the Great Northern Railroad, died here after a brief illness.

St. Paul—Despite economies affected thus far, including more than a week without pay by all city employes, St. Paul will end the year with a deficit of more than $55,000.

St. Paul—Governor Olson left Minnesota for Washington where he will confer with officials of the Reconstruction Finance corporaiton in an effort to obtain further funds for relief work this winter.

St. Paul—Families in nearly all principal eastern cities this year will have Mnnesota-raised turkeys for Christmas dinners. The Land O'Lakes Creameries, Inc., is shipping 125 carloads of turkeys east.

Duluth—Efforts to organize the 117,000 potato growers of Minnesota are being undertaken by Governor Olson and R. A. Trovatten, commissioner of agriculture, together with representative potato growers in the state.

Paynesville—Arrest of M. J. Van Vorst, former justice of the peace in Paynesville, at Tucson, Ariz., was revealed by Sheriff B. E. Schoener of Stearns county. Van Vorst is charged with grand larceny in the third degree.

Wabasha—Twelve-year-old Leonard Thorpe, described by his school teacher as a very good boy, shot and killed his stepfather, Mike Hiddleston, 70, of Plainview. He said he did it to save his mother from beatings. He was acquitted.

St. Paul—The state board of health, through Dr. A. J. Chesley, executive secretary, asked local boards of health to warn the public of the prevalence of influenza. Dr. Chesley said the disease now exists nationwide and was brought into Minnesota apparently from the east.

Minneapolis—The new milk delivery ordinance, which prohibits retail deliveries earlier than 6 a. m. from November to March, became effective here. It was designed to minimize early morning noises and to get better use of daylight, because of the curtailed street lighting schedule.

Minneapolis—Applications for work were received from 38,964 persons in Minneapolis by the Minnesota Public Employment service during a 17-month period ending November 30. Applications from the Twin Cities and Duluth totaled 95,739. The service during that period made 40,456 placements, 16,044 from Minneapolis.

Jackson—A cock pheasant was perched precariously on the clock when a school teacher opened the District 108 school house recently. It broke a window getting in. Before the harassed teacher could decide what should be done the frightened bird sailed down from the clock and into another window, taking about half the glass out with it.

Duluth—The plea of 51 northern Minnesota iron ore mine operators and owners for 20 per cent tax reduction on unmined ore, was denied by the state tax commission. The companies would have escaped from $3,000,000 in taxes had the valuation of unmined ore been cut the $44,000,000 they requested. The proposed reduction was resisted by Iron range municipalities.

Waseca—Announcement of the gift of a $10,000 trust fund to the city of Waseca by Mr. and Mrs. Guy W. Everett and daughter, Esther Lillian, was made to the city council.

St. Paul—The population of all state institutions was 15,993, as of last June 30, the state board of control biennial report shows. This was an increase of 1,703 persons over the previous year. The report showed that during the biennium just completed, 9,251 persons were admitted to the insitutions, an increase of 1,173 over the preceding binneium.

Statute Books Clogged With Ancient By-Laws

The Bank of England decided, at the last meeting of the general court, to change certain by-laws in order to bring them into conformity with present-day practice. With surprising enterprise, it proceeded to cancel a regulation dating from 1608 which provided that all employees of the bank should be elected annually by ballot by the court of directors. Another change was made in a by-law last revised in 1733, which made it necessary that cash not required for current needs should be kept under three or more locks, and that the keys should be held by three or more persons selected from a group consisting of the governor, vice governor and the directors.

In this country multitudes of anachronistic, forgotten, and absurd laws remain upon our statute books and are occasionally unearthed by some enterprising troublemaker who finds it advantageous to bring them to the attention of the public authorities. As a people, however, we have no passionate desire to cling to outmoded institutions, whereas the English display a pronounced weakness for old forms and observances out of dislike for change or from positive love of traditional practices. These national characteristics have saved the English from some of the mistakes that we often make because of restless desire for novelty. It is impossible, however, to discover any advantage in the retention of the Seventeenth and early Eighteenth century banking by-laws in the Twentieth century, which are ludicrously unsuited to present-day conditions and productive only of needless trouble.—New York Journal of Commerce.

An Old Friend in a New Garb

Two years of experimental work preceded the introduction of Chocolate Cascarets. The original candy laxative which has been in vogue ever since the days of the Cleveland administration now has a running mate in trade. The new Chocolate Cascarets might be called a "commercial child of the depression." They have already scored a three-base hit on the count of good flavor, satisfactory action and an attractive package.

The old style Cascarets continue and both are progressing along the well advertised way, emphasizing the age-old slogan that was adopted back in the days when George Ade was an ad-man, viz., "They work while you sleep."—Adv.

Improvement

The bishop's little granddaughter was enjoying one of his occasional visits, perched on his knee and scrutinizing his face intently. Presently she said: "Grandfather, smile."

He dutifully smiled, and Charlotte continued: "Now, you look much better. A good deal of the time your face looks sad, but the most of the time it's just plain dumb."

Philosopher Sets Out Seven Mistakes of Man

"There are seven mistakes of life that many of us make," said a famous writer, and then he gave the following list, according to the Dayton News:

1. The delusion that individual advancement is made by crushing others down.
2. The tendency to worry about things that cannot be changed or corrected.
3. Insisting that a thing is impossible because we ourselves cannot accomplish it.
4. Refusing to set aside trivial preferences, in order that important things may be accomplished.
5. Neglecting development and refinement of the mind and not acquiring the habit of reading and study.
6. Attempting to compel other persons to believe and live as we do.
7. The failure to establish the habit of saving money.

Village Council Had Their Annual Meeting

The village council held their annual meeting on Tuesday evening. O. E. Sovde, the only new member of the council, took oath of office, and the bonds of Justice of the Peace and Constable were approved.

H. O. Hanson, president of the council, also appointed the members of the Poor committee, the Street committee, and Board of Health. A few new rules governing the permission of holding dances in the village were also outlined by the council.

Lawrence Haglund, who was elected constable for two years at the last election, was appointed Village Marshal and Dance Police for the coming year.

Shoots Partridges for State

Game Warden W. H. Chas. Munn Named Speaker

Organization of both houses of the Minnesota legislature was practically completed on Tuesday with the conservative majority controling each step in the senate procedure, and the supporters of Governor Floyd B. Olson dominating the house.

On the house side, Charles Munn of Osseo was elected speaker by a vote 72 to 56 over Andrew Finstuen, Kenyon, and the farmer-laber-liberal combine then put through their full slate of house officers, former Representative Frank T. Starkey defeating John I. Levin for chief clerk.

The vote for Starkey was 88 to 21.

U.S. Still Leads in Exports

The United States held fast to first rank among the world's export nations last year, but the value of its shipments abroad during the first nine months of 1932 dropped 35 per cent from the preceeding year's. This shrinkage brought the exports 62 per cent below the average value of outgoing trade for the past five years. The quantity diminished much less, going about 20 per cent below 1931. These figures were announced Monday by the chamber of commerce of the United States, which concluded that export prices averaged about 18 per cent below those of the first nine months of 1931.

Mr. and Mrs. Sam Lorentson and family, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Gunheim and son Clayton, Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson and family, Peter Hanson, and Richard Lorentson were entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. G. Sanoden last Thursday evening.

Tax Rates in County Show General Gain

Marshall county's decided decrease in assessed valuation coupled with the noticeable increase in the state tax rate, resulted in a general increase in tax rates for the various sub-divisions in Marshall county, according to a compilation of tax rates compiled this week in the office of Levi G. Johnson, county auditor.

In 98 school districts and 35 townships and villages of the county, tax rates were increased, while in 51 school districts and 23 townships and villages the rates were decreased, a comparison of 1932 and 1931 tax rates reveals. Only six school districts and two townships and villages will go into 1933 with the same tax rates.

With a tax rate for school, village, county and state purposes totaling 234.5 mills, the village of Holt will have the highest tax rate ever levied in the village and in the entire county. When tax rate figures for the state are compiled, it is believed that the rate in Holt will be among the highest in the entire state. However, the assessed valuation in the Holt district is low, and consequently the rate shows a corresponding increase. Last year Holt's total rate was 207.48 mills. The 1932 rate includes 26.5 mills for state and county purposes; 57.3 mills for village purposes and 150.7 mills for the school district.

The lowest tax rate for the villages will be found in the village of Viking with a total rate of 69.2 mills. This rate includes the state and county rate of 26.5 together with 9.7 mills for village purposes and 33 mills for school district.

The total rate in Middle River will be 171 mills, of which 26.5 is for state and county; 34.5 mills for the village and 110 mills for the school district. The Alvarado rate will total 108.4 mills of which 59.9 is for the school and 22 for the village. Argyles rate totals 121.8 mills, including 40.7 mills for the village and 54.6 mills for the school. Grygla will have a total rate of 85.9 mills of which 31 mills is for the village and 28.4 mills for the school.

In Newfolden, the total rate is 134.9 mills of which 77.4 mills is for the school. Oslo's total rate is 122.4 mills of which 25 mills is for the village and 70.9 mills for the school. Stephen will have a total rate of 109.4 mills of which 29.4 mills is for the village and 53.5 mills for the school. Strandquist will have a higher rate with a total of 153.4 mills of which 20.2 mills is for the village and 106.7 mills for school.

The rate in Warren which was release a couple of weeks ago, will total 98.7 mills of which 18.7 mills is for the operation of the city and 53.5 mills is for the operation of the school district.

The townships and villages having lower rates than last year for their own township and village puposes include the following: Big Woods, Bloomer, Comstock, Como, Eagle Point, Huntly, McCrea, Marsh Grove, Middle River, Moose River, Nelson Park, Newfolden, New Maine, Sinnott, Tamarac, Viking, Wanger, Warreton, Argyle, Middle River village, Stephen, Oslo and Warren. Vega township and the village of Grygla will have the same tax rates for the coming year as they had this year.—Warren Sheaf.

Building for the Future

Planning and building for the future is what makes a business successful.

What we want to do is to build for the future patronage of every producer of cream, poultry and eggs of the community.

The average cream station is not building up the future cream market of the community in which they operate, but instead are instrumental in tearing down the dairy industry. "In what manner?" you may ask. In encouraging the marketing of poor quality cream—resulting in a poor quality of cream—resulting in a poor quality of butter being put on the market, which decreases consumption of butter and causes surpluses and low prices.

Minnesota State Budget Is Cut Eight Million Dollars

A state budget of $35,600,000 for 1933-34, representing a decrease of $8,428,000 or 20 per cent from appropriations for the present biennium, was announced Monday by Mrs. Jean W. Wittich, state budget commissioner.

Her plan of reducing costs, which will be presented to the legislature which started their long session on Tuesday, includes payroll reductions through enforced vacations, and shifts and replacements of some state agencies.

Mrs. Wittich asserted her plan would reduce the state tax levy for general revenue 3.2 mills annually.

The employes furlough plan excludes the state board of control and the University of Minnesota because of slashes already made.

It includes a one, two and four weeks reduction, depending on the salaries received.

Commissioner Wittich also announced she will recommend abolishment of three levies affectiong the tax on property other than that for the state revenue fund which will effect a saving of 3.2 mills annually or approximately $9,500,000 in taxes for the two years.

Mrs. Wittich said she was not ready to announce now when these reductions would be made, or what levies should be abolished.

Abolishment of the levies will not curtail activities of the government, she asserted.

Arvid Carlson and family suffered the loss of most of their household goods and belongings on Wednesday when fire gutted their home in Middle River. According to a report received here the fire started in the basement from a short circuit in the electric light wires.

Obituary

Funeral services were conducted here on Saturday afternoon from the Nazareth Lutheran church for Olaus Rodahl, a pioneer of this community. Mr. Rodahl was born in Norway in the year 1882 and was at time of his death fifty years of age. He spent his boyhood in Norway, where he was educated in the schools and church work. At the age of eighteen years he joined in with others bound for America, and landed in this country in 1900.

He came at once to Neilsville, Minn., where he settled down to make the best of opportunities offered him in this new land. In 1906 he was united in marriage to Josie Vigen of Neilsville and the newlyweds made their home in that vicinity for about five years. Then the family moved to Marshall county and settled in East Valley township, where they began on a homestead. Later, in 1920, after selling this farm, he bought a farm in Agdar township, where he resided until his death.

Mr. Rodahl took an active part in affairs in his home township and was a member of the board of directors of the local creamery. He also represented a number of land owners and banks in Winona and looked after their interests here.

He leaves to mourn his loss besides a faithful wife, eleven children, Norman, Orris, Lester, Julien, Victor, Leroy, Gladys, Clarice, Eleanor, Cora and May. He also leaves a brother, Anton Rodahl, and a brother-in-law, Bennie Vigen of Grygla.

Rev. Redal officiated and interment was made in the Holt cemetery.

Arnoldy Named Highway Chief

John P. Arnoldy, chief inspector in the Hennepin county attorney's office and former city detective and intelligence corps officer in the army, has been named head of the state highway patrol. He will take over the duties assumed temporarily by Captain George Kuch after the resignation of Earle Brown.

Minnesota Has Only Herd Of Caribou Left in U. S

Special efforts have been taken by the state to protect a herd of woodland caribou, now roaming in the Red Lake game preserve in northern part of Beltrami county, claimed by W. T. Cox, state conservation commissioner, to be the only remaining herd of its kind in the United States.

Although thousands of this species once roamed in the northern section of the state there are only about 12 of the animals left, commissioner Cox said.

The caribou have been seen on several occasions the past three years by settlers in Beltrami, Lake of the Woods and Roseau counties. They brouse on moss and linchen, living mostly in swamps in the Red Lake wild life refuge.

Several of the animals have been killed the past few years, Commissioner Cox said, but the department of conservation is taking every possible step to protect the herd.

"Although thousands of woodland caribou once roamed the state the have migrated and have been killed off until only this small herd remains," Commissioner Cox said.

Every sportsman in the state should cooperate with the game wardens in protecting this only remaining herd of Caribou.

Minerva and Harriet Hanson of Roseau spent the week end at the G. Sanoden home.

Card of Thanks

We hereby express our thanks to all our friends and neighbors for their kindness and sympathy shown us during our bereavement in the loss of our beloved husband father and brother.

We also thank Rev. Redal for his comforting words; also the quartet for their songs and our friends for the beautiful floral offering.

Mrs. Olaus Rodahl and children
Mr. and Mrs. Anton Rodahl and family
Mr. and Mrs. Bennie Vigen and family.

Notice to Public

We have now taken over the lands and property owned by certain banks and parties of Winona and that was being attended to by the late Olaus Rodahl. All parties interested in any of this property are requested to inquire for the proper information at this bank.

Dead Sea Yields Valuable Minerals

Transportation Limits Output of Chemicals.

Washington.—With wheat at the lowest price since 1591, and other agricultural products selling at a fraction of earlier prices, world geography played a paradoxical trick when fertilizer material from the Dead sea recently arrived in New York.

Although the commercial exploitation of the salts of the Dead sea is the result of experiments carried on by M. A. Novomeysky since 1911, it was an American who made the first modern exploration of the "Sea of Death." W. F. Lynch's amusing adventures with camels and flat boats, nearly a century ago, resulted in a workmanlike survey of the Dead sea and its amazing properties. This deepest hole in the world, outside the ocean basins, is the subject of a bulletin from the National Geographic society.

Sea Once Much Larger.

"Before Behring straits separated Alaska from Asia and before the Straits of Dover marked off England from France, the Dead sea was four times its present length and its level was that of the Mediterranean," says the bulletin. "Most of the salts from that larger sea still remain in the smaller evaporation pan now known as the Dead sea. From pipes sunk 175 feet below the surface of this natural concentrate compounded by sun and wind, a new chemical company is now pumping saline water. This super-sea water, so dense that organic life cannot exist in it, is spread out into 500 acres of artificial evaporation pans contained by five miles of dikes. The savage sun does most of the work, but 400 Arab and Jewish laborers are already employed in 'mining' the precious salts from the sea.

"Four principal salts are being extracted; muriate of potash, used in the manufacture of fertilizer; bromine, used in medicines, photography and dye-making; chloride of magnesium, used in textile and cement manufacture, and common salt, formerly a Turkish monopoly.

"From this sea in which nothing can live, finer crops are to come. Salts which failed to heal Herod's illness will help in world healing. Although the pillar of solid salt which is pointed out as 'Lot's wife' still rises on the slope of Jebel Usdum, close by the Dead sea shore, common salt, a by-product of the Palestine Potash company, sets up a strong competition in the local market.

"Five and a half miles of new road link the seaside factory with the well-paved 'road to Jericho,' made famous by the Good Samaritan; but the limiting factor in present operations is not the low price of chemicals but the availability of transportation. Diesel-engined trucks now haul the chemicals out of the world's deepest land depression and up to the Judean plateau. At Jerusalem it is loaded in trains bound to Egypt, Jaffa or Haifa. Within ten years of commencing operations, the new company agrees to produce a thousand tons of potassium chloride a week.

Depression Now Malaria-Free.

"In spite of the almost inexhaustible supply of Dead sea salts, there seems little chance of flooding the market unless agricultural conditions alter radically. The demand for potash has doubled every decade in recent times. At present 3,000,000 tons of muriate of potash a year are produced, principally in Germany and Alsace-Lorraine.

"There is gold in the Dead sea water—as there is in the waters of every sea—but no process for getting it out commercially has been developed.

"For centuries the Ghor, as the Arabs call the great depression of the Dead sea, has been an unhealthy locality. The local population—excepting the hordes of prewar pilgrims and tourists who crowded the Jericho road at Easter time—was confined to a few miserable Arabs with negroid features. One triumph of the new company has been its health record. The former pest-hole is now a healthy spot in spite of the terrific heat, for malaria, a former scourge, has been abolished.

"The millions of tons of salts to be hauled from the Dead sea will probably avoid the present 4,000-foot climb to Jerusalem by means of a railway which may soon be built up the Jordan valley to Beisan, historic site where the plain of Esdraelon breaks away to the Ghor. From Beisan the chemicals will go to Haifa, there to be transshipped into ocean liners accommodated behind the fine new breakwater, which is reaching out from Mount Carmel toward Acre."

Expedition to Uncover Ancient City of Lachish

London.—The Old Testament City of Lachish, about 25 miles south of Jerusalem, where the prophet Isaiah prayed that the city be saved from the Assyrians with the result that 18,000 Assyrians were destroyed mysteriously overnight, is to be uncovered.

Sir Henry Wellcome, fellow of the Royal society, soon will send an expedition into Palestine to clear away the sands of centuries from the city which fell before Sennacherib's armies. Various American archeological interests also will be represented.

Those interested in Biblical history are looking forward to the findings of the expedition because successive cities built on the foundations and ruins of older cities make Old Testament geography and history perplexing. Authorities think that Tell Duweir is the site of the ancient City of Lachish, and excavations in the environs are expected to reveal the stronghold of the children of Israel.

U. S. Undertakes Crime Reform

New Institution to Look to Prisoner's Future.

Lewisburg, Pa.—In the new United States Northeastern penitentiary, near here, which except for a forbidding 21-foot wall and a few carefully concealed bars bears more resemblance to a college than to the accepted idea of penal institutions, Uncle Sam has just begun his most ambitious experiment in reformation of the criminal.

The first prisoners have been transferred from Atlanta, Ga., and more will be brought regularly until the prison has its normal capacity of 1,200 inmates.

The warden of the new penitentiary is Maj. H. C. Hill, formerly in charge of the Illinois state prison at Joliet.

Prisoners from Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and possibly Delaware, Maryland, and Ohio will be housed in the penitentiary.

Emblazoned on the proscenium arch in the prison auditorium, which is large enough to seat all the prisoners that the institution will hold, are the words, "That which is past and gone is irrevocable; wise men have enough to do with things present and to come."

These classic words from Bacon, according to Sanford G. Bates, director of the bureau of federal prisons, in Washington, strike the keynote of the new institution and the new federal prison program. The penitentiary will look to the prisoners' future rather than their past.

The old-style steel cell block has been abandoned at the new prison. There are only 83 disciplinary cells for the most desperate prisoners. For the most part, prisoners will live in single rooms, their quarters being bettered for good behavior and a capacity for reform.

The institution was built at a remarkably low cost. Federal prison officials estimate that it was erected at a cost of about $2,000 per man housed, compared with the $4,000 or $5,000 per inmate of some of the other new prisons.

Row Over Gem Recalls Queen in Old Scandal

Paris.—The necklace of 45 very beautiful diamonds given by the city of Paris to Marie Antoinette, princess of Austria-Lorraine, on the occasion of her marriage to Louis XVI, King of France, has become the center of a dispute here.

It is being waged among the heirs of the late Don Jaime de Bourbon, Carlist pretender to the throne of Spain. He died without leaving a will and has six heirs. His fortune consisted of a number of beautiful chateaux and improved farming property and some very gorgeous jewels, among them the necklace.

This necklace was the reason for the public beating administered to the Countess de la Motte, a beautiful adventuress, who was stripped in the Place de la Bastille by the public executioner and whipped by order of the queen.

The queen's anger was due to the fact that the countess had conspired with the Duc de Rohan and some jewelers to persuade the queen to buy another necklace.

The story got about that the duke, who was in love with Marie Antoinette, was going to give the queen this necklace, a circumstance that led to the belief that the King's consort had been too friendly with the duke. For all this the countess was held responsible and punished in the fashion of that time.

Cigarette Coupons Used for Currency

Washington. — Javanese natives have adopted cigarette coupons as a new form of currency, according to advices to the Commerce department. Faced with an increasing lack of money, the natives started using the cigarette coupons issued by domestic producers as legal tender among themselves. The use of the coupons as currency has now developed to a point where they are good for purchasing meals, clothing, phonograph records and even motor cars.

Young Policewoman Sets Fine Service Record

Lima, Ohio.—In four terms as constable of Lima, Miss Gertrude Miller has placed 579 men and 25 women in jail for various offenses against the peace and for varying lengths of sentences.

Yet Miss Miller's success could not by any stretch of the imagination be laid to the brute strength so infrequently associated with the term "cop." No one time did she find "strong arm" tactics necessary or even advisable. Her technique is based upon a combination of intelligence, firmness, charm, and courage.

Many of the wrongdoers tracked down and locked up by Lima's young and attractive policewoman surrendered without a struggle. Most of them were surprised at their own lack of resistance in the face of arrest.

Others who made the error of committing offenses against society within the limits of Lima admitted that it was something of a pleasure to be arrested by the feminine officer. She never bullied or blustered, but had a way of convincing the toughest of them that it was to their advantage to pay the price of their misdeeds.

Child Study Association Changes an Old Theory

This used to be the formula for training of unruly children. But the Child Study association has developed a different theory. It also believes in "catching 'em young"—at the age of about two weeks, in fact.

Treating them rough is a good idea, too, to avoid spoilage, the association believes, but on the "telling them" side it holds that an almost unlimited amount of knowledge and instruction is good for children.

The Fable of Adding Up Another Year

By GEORGE ADE

WNU Service

ONCE there was a prominent Citizen who put in a good Part of the Time telling himself that he was a Regular Feller. Just a grown-up Boy Scout, a Dispenser of Sunshine, carrying about 120 Pounds Pressure of Civic Pride, and the life of almost any Party. What you might call, if choosing to coin a Bit of Description, a red-blooded American.

He always took off his Hat when the Flag went by in a parade organized by the Foreign Element and he could Ta-Ta his Way through "The Star-Spangled Banner" and he had read enough history to know that the Revolutionary War was fought in the Eastern Section of our own Fair, or at least Fair to Middling, Land and the Home Team won by a single Touchdown.

It befell that one Day, as 1931 was getting ready to take the Count and make way for the delightful Uncertainties of 1932, this same Ornament to Society was seated at his Desk, gazing at a new Date Pad presented by an Insurance Company, and reflecting sentimentally upon the widely advertised Fact that another Year was petering out.

He found himself reviewing the Period which had oozed by so rapidly since the preceding January First, and in doing so he could not refrain from hurling a few Bouquets.

Family Ignorance Is Bliss.

"Not so worse, everything considered," he said to Himself. "A few more gilt-edge Securities planted in the sheet-iron Box. I traded in the Old Car just at the Right Time. In another Week it would have fallen in two. The Preparation which was guaranted to arrest Baldness did not work. I lost the Third Flight because the new Shaft in my Mashie was not the same as the Old One, and I am Eight Pounds Overweight and I have a little higher Blood Pressure than Doc says is good for me, but I can still eat Mince Pie for Lunch and smoke six Cigars a Day, so I should fret.

"No one can say that I ain't been good to my family. I have given Emma and the two girls and Harold everything they needed and about $6,000 worth of junk that no sane Individual ever could possibly need. Yes, sir, the Old Boy has been a dandy Husband and Father and as long as they don't know about the little Bust-Over at Atlantic City during the Convention, the whole Thing is just the same as if it never happened. Besides, I didn't fall, I was shoved. And, as far as that's concerned, what I pulled wasn't any rougher than what the other Boys were doing while under the Influence of the Salt Air. So my Conscience isn't troubling me—much.

"As nearly as I can recall them, having no copy at hand, there are several of the Ten Commandments that I have not shattered. That's more than some Birds can say. I'll admit that I haven't punched the Clock over at the Church any too often, but I've got an Alibi. I found out all about those Letters that Saint Paul wrote to the Corinthians and Thessalonians a good many years ago when I had to go to Sunday School. Furthermore, that Preacher has a convulsive Adam's Apple and makes me nervous. I sent the usual Check and I am certain that when the Funeral Sermon is preached it will be discovered that I am in Good Standing, even if I have carried most of my Religion in my Wife's Name.

"At all Times I have kept in Mind the good old Golden Rule which says that One should never put off until Tomorrow what might be done this Afternoon. Come to think of it, I may be mixed in my Dates. Possibly the Golden Rule has something to do with giving the Opposition a split of Fifty-Fifty. Well, I never figured that I could get very far unless I held out for about Seventy-Thirty, and I could name a lot of highly respected Guys who make it Ninety-Ten. At least, I stack up better than the Average. When you are sitting in with a Bunch of Hard-Boiled Comanches who deal from the Bottom of the Deck and have all of the Aces marked, I never could see the Sense of trying to get no better than an Even Break."

A Coving Dove With an Eagle's Crest.

"It is easy to bear up under Criticism while there is plenty of Velvet in sight. I never cut a Throat unless I am sure that the victim has his own knife all sharpened up for Me. The Idea is to be a Good Sport but not to lose anything. Observe the Regulations but don't let your Rivals always interpret them for you. I think I am a Square Shooter, considering what I have been up against in the way of Overhead and a Fluctuating Market and the Necessity of dealing with so many Crooks.

"Taking all the Facts into Consideration, I have been a darn Good Citizen. If I have violated very many Laws it is because a Busy Man can't keep Tab on all of the new Statutes—Federal, State and Municipal. In regard to the Trouble I had over the Income Tax, it seemed to me that I had a Right to all of those Exemptions. It has always been my Idea to pay about the Same as the Neighbors were handing over and it wasn't my Fault if they tried to hold out. I will admit that I put up a moderate Holler when that fresh Special Agent stung me for the increased Surtax for 1928, 1929 and 1930.

"It made me kind o' sore, because when it comes to supporting the Government no one can say that I've been tight or backward. My private Crest is the American Eagle. Look at all those Liberty Bonds. Didn't I say, in my speech before the Chamber of Commerce, that we ought to back up the President and the secretary of the treasury in their patriotic Endeavor to reduce Taxation. Who was it wrote that Piece for the Paper about our collecting all that Coin that Europe owes us? Every time the old U. S. needs Help you'll find me so immersed in my Private Affairs that I can't find Time to put in a Plug for the General Welfare of the American People.

"During this whole Year I haven't consulted a Lawyer or had a Run-in with Anybody whatsoever unless I was absolutely in the Right. The Trouble is that when a broad-minded Person, like Me, tries to live up to that Motto about Live and let Live, a lot of porch-Climbers take Advantage of him. I can truly say that I wouldn't have lost a Law-Suit during the entire Year if the Facts had been fairly presented to the Court. I'm a Combinaton of cooing Dove and snow-white Lamb, unless somebody crosses me."

Having impartially sized himself up from every Angle, he felt so proud of the Glorous Record he had established during 1931 that he went out and bought himself two suits of Clothes and a Racoon Coat as a delayed Christmas Gift.

That Home Environment, as Teacher Found It

"So many lecturers prate of home environment," said Mrs. Ramsey Sherman at a New York luncheon, "but investigation has proven that the public school environment is far higher than one finds in the average home. America as a whole is shockingly illiterate.

"A Brooklyn school teacher, finally getting out of patience over the language used by one of her pupils, took the trouble to go to the boy's home and complain to his parents, whom she knew to be in very good financial circumstances.

"'You must do something about Johnny's language. I've tried and tried, but it does no good.'

"'What does he say?' asked the fond father.

"'Oh, lots of things. Why, only today he said: 'I ain't never went nowhere.'

"'He ain't, ain't he?' exclaimed the father in astonishment. 'Why, the young whelp's went farther and saw more places than most kids twice his age.'"

Credit Wisconsin Man With Ice Cream Sundae

According to the Two Rivers (Wisconsin) Reporter, the modern ice cream sundae was invented by George Hallauer, of that city. E. C. Bernes, retired Two Rivers confectioner, is quoted as saying that trimmings on ice cream dishes were not known 40 years ago. Chocolate sirup was used only for flavoring sodas.

One night young George Hallauer dropped into the Bernes ice cream parlor. He ordered ice cream and then noticed the chocolate sirup bottle. He asked for some on his ice cream.

"Oh, I'll try it," said George, the pioneer.

He tried it all right, and liked it, and pretty soon the whole town was asking for ice cream "with stuff on it."

A competitor of Bernes resented the fad that increased the cost, to the dealer, of an ice cream portion, so he announced he would only serve the new dish on Sunday. Hence the name. —Detroit Free Press.

Self-Revelation

We ourselves are the real word, the life utterance which speech often falsifies. There are faces which never deceive nor mislead us. A spiritual nature can but be frank and honest, because its foundation stones are laid in the truth, and it knows that nothing else holds. It is in us as human beings instinctively to recognize and hate insincerity. Nobody is in the end deceived by expression which is merely outward and perfunctory. Our inner life is transparent; it cannot conceal itself; if it is a true life it has no need or desire of concealment.—Lucy Larcom.

One Enough

The word "pianos" was in the spelling lesson, but when the teacher looked at the papers she found that John had written the singular instead of the plural form.

"I gave you 'pianos', John," complained the teacher. "It was not one; it was more than one."

"But, Miss S——," remonstrated John, "there's no use in learning how to spell more than one piano; we'll never have any more than that."

"Shooting Stars"

A "shooting star" is a meteorite which has entered the field of the earth's gravitational attraction and by friction with the earth's atmosphere has been heated to incandescence. Most "shooting stars" never fall upon the earth because, in their rapid flight through the air they are completely consumed by frictional heat and are dissolved into gases. Larger ones occasionally fall to earth as blackened masses of stone or metal.

GIGOLO DOG MUST STAND TRIAL FOR THEFT OF COLLAR

Cagnes-Sur-Mer, France. — Caesar, the dog gigolo, is in jail!

He was arrested for theft, caught with the goods as he was about to bury a diamond studded collar he had just swiped from a lady Peke as if it were a mere vulgar bone.

News of Caesar's arrest fell like a bombshell in the Anglo-American artist colony here, where his friends are legion. People of international and Montparnasse fame like Laurence Vail, Kay Boyle, Ling Gillepsie, Frank Scully, Bob Brown, Ross Saunders and others are out trying to raise the bail money.

Locked Up in Jail.

Caesar's plight would not be so bad had there been a dog pound in this village. It's for a lack of such premises that Caesar was locked up in the lonely jail, occupied only sporadically when the Anglo-Saxon artists put on an all-night shindig with bricks and gendarmes for a grand finale.

Now he is up on two counts, theft and vagrancy. There is a possibility that poor Caesar will have to face a firing squad if his friends do not succeed in raising bail money. Nevertheless, the local magistrate said that Caesar's case will be called in court just as if he were a human.

No Ordinary Dog.

Caesar, who is no ordinary dog, long has been the pride and boast of the boheme in this town. The world's one and only known dog gigolo. Caesar acknowledges many breeds. He has the elongated body of a Prussian daschshund, the head and legs of an Irish terrier, the bushy tail of an Alsatian wolf hound and the all knowing eyes of a Socrates.

Whence Caesar came, nobody knows. How he lives, every one knows. Having patronized Cagnes for the last five years, Caesar makes it his specialty to befriend aristocratic chows, Pekes and other lap dogs, ingratiating himself in the eyes of the owners to the point where he is included in the household and general scheme of things.

This way he always gets the best of things, but constancy being the least of his qualities this dog gigolo frequently changes lady pets and households.

Poncho Fails to Save Him From Customs Man

New York.—Michel Sarwicki is a barber in Chicago most of the time, but there are periods of rebellion when he is a wanderer.

When the liner President Coolidge docked he came down the third class gangway. He was dressed in an old straw hat, a blue shirt open at the collar, overalls such as the farmers of Illinois wear daily, and an enormous poncho.

"It is rather chilly," said Sarwicki. "Do you think it will rain this morning?"

A customs inspector replied that he did not, and would the passenger be so good as to emerge from the large awning in which he was hiding?

Eventually Michel did emerge. In the privacy of the customs shack on the pier prying fingers brought forth all manner of things from his coat, among them sixteen bottles of liquors.

Crazed Mother Murders Two Girls and Herself

Sturgis, Mich.—A crazed mother shot her two daughters to death near here, locked the doors of her farm home, set it afire, and then killed herself.

The victims were Mrs. William Ochs, forty-five, wife of a farmer living seven miles from here, and her daughters, Laura Jean, fifteen, and Alvina, seven.

The tragedy occurred while the husband and father was only a short distance from the house, doing the morning chores. Ochs extinguished the fire with small damage to the home.

Man Who Heard His Own Obituary Is Still Alive

Benton, Ill.—Steve Patton, who listened to his own funeral sermon last year, still looks upon it as "the biggest day of my life," as he enters his eighty-first year.

Patton, "as fit as ever," celebrated his birthday quietly here recently. The funeral sermon preached last year attracted considerable publicity. Patton sat in the rom and listened to the eloquence of the preacher, viewed the flowers, and welcomed the "mourners."

He said "if people are going to say nice things about me, I want to hear them. It won't do me any good for them to say it after I'm dead."

Man Fined Under Law Predating Civil War

Shreveport, La.—Police dug deep into the records recently and charged Harry Rozalsky, forty-six, with violation of an old Shreveport ordinance that predated the Civil war. The ordinance, passed in 1850, forbids the keeping of pigeons in the city limits and carries a fine of $50.

Landis lowered his pistol, but held it in readiness. "Why did you stop here?" he asked.

The man jerked his head toward the open cowl of the car, where a disconnected ignition wire offered the reason for a stop.

"Go ahead and fix it," said Landis curtly. Then he picked up the dropped rifle by the barrel and struck it against a boulder, shattering the stock. "Just to keep you yaps from getting careless with somebody else," he snapped, tossing the two pieces of the disabled weapon into the tonneau of the flivver. "Now couple up that wire and get out of here. And do it quick!"

While the men were working at the wire, he motioned to Wally.

"Look in the car and see if they've got any more artillery," he said; and he and Markham followed it up to where the "Tennesseeans" had parked the roadster.

They waited beside the road until after the car had limped on around the next gulch looping. Then they got into their own car and headed for Brewster.

"Well," Markham said, after they had left the scene of their late adventure a mile or more to the rear, "what's the answer? Is that wreck in the gulch what is left of the Fleetwing?"

"I couldn't be sure. But it was an Eight. You saw that much, didn't you?"

Markham nodded. "Next, what's the answer to the two men in the flivver? Have you figured that out?"

"No; though I more than half believe they were lying. It's lucky for them that I wasn't sure."

"Gosh!" said Markham with a laugh. "A little while ago I said something to the effect that you might be lacking a few of the red corpuscles. I take it all back—every last word of it. Why have you never shown me the fighting side of you before, Owen? You haven't, you know."

Landis' smile was a mere tightening of the lips.

"You've heard the old saying 'Beware the wrath of a patient man,' haven't you? I'm patient, Wally—too d—d patient, I guess. As I said, I'm fed up. From this time on, by the Lord Harry, I fight for my own hand! I've been robbed and sandbagged and shot at, and the next man that tries it is going to get the best I've got in the box!"

"Gosh!" said Wally again; and this time he did not laugh.

On the flight down the mountain nothing happened until they were on the stretch approaching the side road leading to Canby's mine. Here, however, there was a near accident. As they ran down they saw a heavy truck backing out of the road leading to the mine. Markham sounded his horn, but the driver of the truck held on in a way to place the heavy vehicle fairly across the highway.

It was too late to stop, and Markham did the only thing there was to do if a collision was to be averted; stepped on the gas, and with a quick twist of the wheel whipped the roadster around the rear of the backing truck with no more than inches to spare between a deep roadside ditch and the trundling menace.

No word was spoken until they were speeding over the mesa road toward the city. Then Markham said, "We ought to have shot that truck driver, Owen. It would have been justifiable homicide, don't you think?"

"I don't think; I know," was the gritting reply. "That was one of Canby's trucks; I saw the name 'Quavapai mine' on it as we came up. It's running in my mind that we'll have to kill a few people out here, yet, before we're through, Wally. And by heavens, I'm telling you, right now, if they keep on asking for it, they'll get it!"

CHAPTER X

The Louisville Three

In the evening Landis briefly announced his intention of going to call upon Betty.

"The Stillings live away over in the western suburb," said Markham. "You'd better take a taxi, or the roadster."

"For safety's sake, you mean? Not so you could notice it. I'm not dodging anybody or anything tonight."

"Got your war paint on, have you? Don't want me along?"

"No thanks; I'll go alone."

Left to himself, Markham lighted a cigar and picked a quiet corner of the lobby in which to read. Soon Landis returned, the frown of his departure deepened to an unwonted scowl.

"No luck?" said Wally, noting the scowl.

"No. She'd gone out somewhere—with Canby."

"You didn't see the professor?"

"No; he has gone to the fossil fields, wherever they are. I visited with the Stillings—mostly Mr. Stillings, in his den."

"Just friendly gossip?"

"Not altogether. Betty's been talking about us and that broke the ice. The Stillings don't quite like the way she's letting Canby cut in."

"That's the aftermath of his scampishness out here last summer, I suppose."

"Not so much that as other things. Stillings thinks Canby is fixing to pull off something else; and that he is using Betty in some way."

"But how could Betty figure in any of his schemes?"

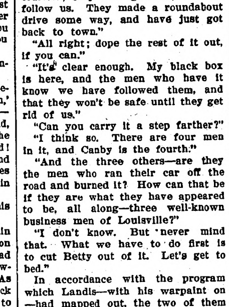
"God knows. But it's plain Stillings believes she does—innocently, of course. He was cautious until he found out where we stand; then he intimated that it was up to us to put a spoke in Canby's wheel."

"Good. You'll do it?"

"We'll both do it. As you remarked, I have my warpaint on, now."

"Anything happened to stir you up afresh?"

"Yes. That shooting this afternoon was a planned atempt to kill us. As I was coming back across town just now I saw a car with running-board of camp dunnage going through by the back streets. There were two men in it, and I saw them as the car came under the crossing electric.



Markham Slowed Down, and as He Did So, Two Men Stepped Out and Signaled Him to Stop.

They were the men who were shooting at us. They were no tin can tourists; they were gunmen, hired to follow us. They made a roundabout drive some way, and have just got back to town."

"All right; dope the rest of it out, if you can."

"It's clear enough. My black box is here, and the men who have it know we have followed them, and that they won't be safe until they get rid of us."

"Can you carry it a step farther?"

"I think so. There are four men in it, and Canby is the fourth."

"And the three others—are they the men who ran their car off the road and burned it? How can that be if they are what they have appeared to be, all along—three well-known business men of Louisville?"

"I don't know. But never mind that. What we have to do first is to cut Betty out of it. Let's get to bed."

In accordance with the program which Landis—with his warpaint on—had mapped out, the two of them promptly laid siege to Miss Betty Lawson. In a week-long contest thus ushered in, Canby fought stubbornly for place, and there were numerous collisions—which seemed to afford Miss Betty no little quiet amusement.

On the seventh day, when Markham, taking his turn, had her out in the blue roadster, she said, "What makes you and Owen freeze up and refuse to talk when I say anything about Bert, Wally? What has he done to make you hate him?"

"We have never had much to do with him, either of us," Markham evaded. Then, bluntly, "Are you going to marry him, Betty?"

She laughed. "Do you know of any reason why I shouldn't?"

"Perhaps not any reason that would appeal to you."

"That is dodging," she retorted brightly. "As a friend don't you think you ought to tell me if there is a reason?"

"Yes; and get myself written down in your black book! No, thank you, my dear."

"All right; don't then. I'll ask Owen. I often wonder if boys, nice home boys like you and Owen, know how beautifully transparent you are."

"Thanks; glad you find us so. It's all right to wear a glass front when one has a clear conscience, you know."

"But your consciences are not clear."

"What makes you think so?"

"Perhaps it is the transparency we were speaking of." Then, "Why won't you tell me why you and Owen are out here, Wally?"

"I have told you. Can't we have a vacation as well as other folks?"

"That is exactly what Owen said yesterday; and it means just as much—or as little. Let me tell you something, Wally, dear; in this little round world we're living in, you get just as much as you are willing to give—and no more."

"Meaning?"

"Meaning that if you and Owen can't trust me, I can be clammy, too."

"Now you have got me climbing up a tree," laughed Markham. "Why shouldn't we both trust you?"

"Why, indeed? I'm sure I don't know. Where are you taking me today?"

"Out to meet some friends Starbuck has found for us; the John Smiths."

"Distinguished name," she giggled. "But I know who they are. Mrs. John is the daughter of Col. Dexter Baldwin, the Timanyoni wheat king."

"But I understand they are not at home."

"They are not; they're touring the Yellowstone. It's the Smiths we're calling upon. They are running the big ranch in the colonel's absence."

In due course the blue roadster was parked in the Hillcrest garage, and in Corona Smith Miss Betty speedily found a kindred spirit. And when Smith came home and added his insistence to Corona's urgings that the callers stay to dinner, Wally rejoiced afresh. For Betty accepted the invitation, calling the Stillings house over the phone to let her city hostess know where she was.

After she was through telephoning, Markham called up Landis.

"Any developments?" he asked.

"No," came the answer. "Where are you?"

"Out at Hillcrest, and we are staying for dinner. You're not forgetting that this is the showdown day—the twenty-eighth?"

"No; but nobody has turned up yet. I'm watching the register."

After Smith had smoked an after-dinner cigar with his man guest in the colonel's den, he said regretfully that he'd have to excuse himself; that he was due to meet the westbound Flyer which was bringing some of his business associates from the East.

"It's perfectly all right," Markham assured him. "We'll have to be going, too. I promised Mrs. Stillings I wouldn't keep Betty out late."

When the goodbys were said, Smith went with Markham to the garage. "You'll beat me to town," he said; "I'll have to stop and fill up. And that reminds me; there's been a good bit of whisky running from the hills north of us lately, and today the sheriff gave me a tip. It's likely he and some of his deputies may be on the road between here and town. If you're stopped, just take it easy. Harding won't be rough with you."

"Much obliged for the hint. I'll be law-abiding."

After they had driven out of the Hillcrest grounds, Markham told Betty of the warning Smith had given him. "Just so you won't be scared stiff if we should happen to be stopped," he added.

"I don't scare so easily as all that," was the ready answer. "Didn't Mr. Smith say he was going to town, too?"

"Yes; but he had to stop and fill up with gas."

It was not until the distant lights of Brewster came in sight that their headlamps showed them an unlighted car half hidden under the roadside cottonwoods. Markham slowed down, and as he did so, two men stepped out and signaled him to stop.

Miscalculating his distance slightly, he ran a little way past the men, and when they came up he was ready with an apology. Before he could make it, the door on his side was jerked open and he was seized and dragged out of the car, one of the pair clamping him in a vise-like grip while the other threw a blanket over his head. It was done so quickly that he was half smothered before he realized that this didn't at all square with what Smith had told him of the sheriff and his methods; that he had to deal, not with officers of the law, but with the mysterious assailants who had tried from time to time to efface him and Landis. And then the fight was on.

With his arms fast clamped in the grip of the man behind him, Markham could not get at the holstered pistol under his coat. But his legs were free, and a swift kick doubled the blanketholder up and made him lose his hold long enough to enable Markham to shake his head free of the stifling folds. Instantly he backed the clamper violently against the standing car, bending him over the fender until he was forced to let go to save himself from having his back broken.

At that, Markham got his weapon out, but now the two were between him and the car and he couldn't fire without taking a chance of hitting Betty. The thugs saw their advantage and flung themselves upon him, the shorter of the two crouching low to grab at his legs while the other darted into a clinch and tried to twist the automatic out of his grasp. There was a whirlwind wrestling match, and in the midst of this there came a glare of light and the raucous blast of an auto horn. Markham saw the headlights of an approaching car and saw Betty running to meet it, frantically waving her arms to stop it.

That ended it. As the oncoming car came to a brake-squealing stand and Smith sprang out of it, the two ran for their car, gained it, flung themselves in and were gone.

When Smith and Betty came running up, Markham was beating the dust out of his clothes. For Betty's sake he tried to laugh the incident off.

"Thought you said the sheriff's men wouldn't roughhouse me, Mr. Smith," he chuckled.

"Good Lord—those fellows were not Harding's men; they were just plain holdups! Are you hurt?"

"No; just warmed up a bit, that's all. Scare you half to death, Betty?"

New Wheat Holds Out High Promise

"Yogo" Hailed by Department of Agriculture for Many Reasons.

Prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture.—WNU Service.

A new winter wheat, "yogo," has been released by the Department of Agriculture and the Montana agricultural experiment station for limited trial in Montana under farm conditions.

Yogo is thought to be the best hard red winter wheat yet produced for this northern area by the wheat breeders of the department. It survives the severe winters of Montana, yields well, and is resistant to bunt or stinking smut. These three qualities, difficult to combine in one wheat, furnish the basis for distributing yogo and for believing that it will be successful in northern areas.

At present there is no seed available for distribution. Last year a limited quantity was distributed to farmers in Montana for fall seeding. If the variety continues to show outstanding performance general distribution of seed will follow.

Yogo has been developed and thoroughly tested by the department for yield, winter hardiness, smut resistance, and milling and baking qualities. In 1932, it was one of 50 varieties tested for smut resistance. After the seed had been inoculated with smut it was grown at eight experiment stations in the Great Plains area. Yogo ranked eighth, averaging only 1.7 per cent of infection, whereas karmot, a hard red winter wheat grown extensively in Montana, averaged 47.6 per cent.

Yogo combines the hardy characteristics of all leading winter wheat varieties. In it are Beloglina, recognized in its original home in Russia as one of the most hardy red winter wheats known; minturki, which itself was a cross of Odessa and turkey wheats originating in the Black sea region; and Buffum No. 17, a hardy selection from Turkey developed in Wyoming about 20 years ago.

Yogo is one of many new varieties that are being tested in the comprehensive winter wheat breeding and improvement program of the department in co-operation with the state experiment stations in Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Colorado, Nebraska, Wyoming, Minnesota, South Dakota, North Dakota, and Montana.

Good Idea Is to Unite Two Weak Bee Colonies

The uniting of bee colonies for winter requires some judgment and care. There may be in the yard a fairly strong colony with plenty of brood and little honey, and alongside it a queenless hive with plenty of honey and a decreasing force. The uniting of these two will result in a strong colony with all that is needed for winter. Queenless colonies, as a rule, should be united with colonies that have a good queen. It is useless to try to winter over a queenless colony.

To unite two or more colonies, remove the cover of one hive, spread a sheet of newspaper having a few small holes punched through it over the frames then lift the other hive from the bottom board and set it directly on the newspaper. If a third colony is to be united with this, take off the cover of the second hive and set on the third hive as before. The bees will gnaw away the newspaper and thus unite without fighting. If the queens are equally good, the job of killing the extra queen can be left to the bees, but if one of the queens is old or otherwise inferior, she should be hunted out and killed beforehand.

Get Pig-Raising Pointers

The farmer whose spring pigs are uneven, unthrifty, and undersized at that time of year should visit the nearest farmer he can find in his community who is practicing sanitary management for the prevention of diseases and parasites. He should look at this farmer's pigs, comparing them with his own. This comparison will indicate to him that there is a better method of producing pork than the one he is using. He should talk with the owner of these uniform, thrifty, well-grown pigs and find out how he can eliminate the hazards of diseases and parasites, and how he can get more pork from less feed.—Hoard's Dairyman.

Seed Wheat Smut

An application of copper carbonate dust at the rate of two ounces to each bushel of seed grain will prevent smut in seed wheat. Use a tight barrel or metal drum for mixing, however, as the dust is poisonous and will irritate the eyes and nose. The grain thus treated must not be used for any purpose other than planting, as the carbonate dust is highly poisonous to men and animals.

Thin Forest for Fuel

Persons living near the Nebraska national forest are getting fuel wood from the thinnings of the older plantings of pine, where only barren sand hills existed 30 years ago. They receive the wood in exchange for the cutting. The equivalent of $33.60 worth of work per acre was done by the applicants for wood on an 84-acre tract in the winter of 1931-32. Forest officers marked trees to be cut. The cost of supervision and marketing was less than $4 per acre.

Point for Horse Raisers to Study

All Needs Met by Breeding Associations.

By PROF. H. W. HARPER, New York State College of Agriculture.—WNU Service.

A group of farmers, self-organized to buy a breeding stallion adapted to the horse needs of the community, and who buy a stallion direct from a breeder, is a horse-breeding association.

The horse-breeding association is similar to the old-time horse company, but lacks the outside promoter who has a horse to sell and who has to be paid for his sales-promotion activities. The old horse company, which made horse breeding too expensive in New York state, was usually organized by an agent who sold about twenty-five farmers each a hundred-dollar share of stock, and then sold the company a horse.

It is unnecessary for farmers to pay the added expense, when the horse-breeding association is both cheap and workable. When in need of a stallion, the association may send a committee of its members to horse-breeding sections, where they not only buy a stallion at a fair price, but see good breeding establishments, learn to know the better breeders, and make contacts with prospective buyers. The cost of a stallion under the breeding association plan is usually about half the cost in a horse company.

Repellent Washes That Cause Injury to Trees

Many repellent washes, such as whitewash, diluted lime-sulphur, soap suds, coal tar, gas tar, axle grease, paint, various oils, and other substances, are often recommended as washes or paints for fruit trees to prevent injury by rabbits and field mice. During mild winters all of these materials may work very well. If snow has been on the ground, however, for a week or more and rabbits and mice need food badly, serious injury may be done to the trees where washes of the above substances have been applied.

Such substances as paint, coal tar, gas tar, axle grease, concentrated oils, and combinations of such materials may do serious injury to the tree trunks and even cause the trees to die. To be on the safe side, the grower should not use such substances, as there are others which may be used with as good results without danger of harm.

If repellent or poisonous wash is desired, use whitewash, soap suds, or dormant strength lime-sulphur and add lead arsenate at the rate of about two pounds to 50 gallons. These washes may be applied with a sprayer, which will facilitate the work. Greater concentrations may be made and the repellents applied by means of an ordinary paint brush. There is little or no danger of these washes doing injury to tree trunks no matter when or how applied.—Exchange.

Best Pig Management

If at all possible, the farrowing places for pigs should be out in clean pastures. These pigs should be left in these clean pastures as long as there is any green feed available. There are three reasons why this kind of pig management is advisable: It prevents the pigs becoming infested with worms; it reduces the possible losses from anemia; and it helps to give the pigs a good start before winter weather necessitates their being more closely confined in central hog houses and under dry lot feeding conditions. As a rule, winter rations are more or less deficient in nutritive values. It is not quite fair to young pigs to put them on rations of this kind in addition to their already having a poor start.—Hoard's Dairyman.

Move for "Better Stock"

The basic idea of the "Better Sires—Better Stock" campaign is that the pure-bred sires will "grade up" and improve the flocks and herds. Give them time, and they will. But reports from the more than 17,500 stock owners who have enrolled show that many of them want to hasten the improvement. They know they can do so by acquiring pure-bred females.

The latest figures showing improvement of live stock, as reported to the Department of Agriculture, reveal that on these 17,500 farms where there are no scrub or grade sires there are, on an average, for every pure-bred sire—including cattle, horses, swine, sheep, and goats—six pure-bred females, two cross-bred females, nine grade females, and less than half a scrub female.

Agricultural Hints

Apply mulch around perennial plants and not directly on the tops of them.

Hogs do better on spuds which are cooked, but other live stock obtain more food value from the potatoes which are fed raw.

With 31,095,000 bushels of the 1931 corn crop still remaining on Illinois farms on November 1 this year, the carryover of old corn is the largest since 1926.

* * *

Pure breds or scrubs? A survey in nearly every state of the Union shows that registered animals mature earlier, give a quicker turn-over on investment, make gains on less feed.

TREE IS MONUMENT TO INNOCENT MAN

A man hanged long ago for a crime he did not commit has as his monument the old tree under which he met his death. All of the tree which stands near Fayette, Mo., is dead except the limb from which the man was hanged.

According to musty records, in June, 1857, a man was killed in a field, and John Chapman, a neighbor, was charged with the crime. Despite his protests of innocence he was found guilty and sentenced to death.

After the noose had been fastened around his neck and the rope thrown over the limb Sheriff Boyd McCrary asked the condemned man if he wished to make a statement.

As he predicted, years afterward another man confessed the slaying, clearing Chapman's name.—Grit.

CONSERVATION AND THE FUR SUPPLY

"An active conservation policy," says the Sears, Roebuck Agricultural Foundation, "is the one sure way to check the decrease of fur bearing animals in the United States."

When the white man first came to this country it abounded with astonishing numbers of wild animals and birds. Nowhere, except in Africa, could be found such a variety and profusion of wild life. Although our ancestors took heavy toll of both game animals and fur bearers little difference could be noted up to within less than a hundred years ago. But the rapid advance of civilization and increase in population accomplished what trappers and hunters could not. It drove the fur bearers from their breeding grounds and the buffalo from the plains. Tall cities sprang up where at one time the wolf had stalked unmolested. Great bridges spanned the streams once tenanted by otter, beaver and mink. Whole forests fell under the settler's axe and the draining of swamps for farming deprived countless fur bearers of their homes. Naturally hundreds of thousands of animals perished, but this was not noticed immediately. The heedless waste went on and on. Demand for furs increased by leaps and bounds. Prices shot up. Not only did trappers ply their trade long before and after the prime season, thereby taking much fur which was practically valueless; but also hunters and sportsmen killed thousands of animals for the sheer joy of killing, not even bothering to carry home the carcasses.

Finally thinking people began to realize that if unrestricted trapping and hunting continued there would soon be no fur bearers to take. Conservation commissions were formed in many states. The fur industry gave advice, and even the government took an active part. One by one nearly all the states have passed laws limiting the season during which fur animals may be trapped to the cold winter months when furs are most valuable, and thus insuring the future fur supply. Trappers themselves have been quick to appreciate the advantages of intelligent conservation; and the higher prices they secure for prime furs is more than making up for the fact that they can no longer trap during the unprime season.

Conservation means more, however, than the legislative control of trapping seasons. Trappers are also learning how by more careful skinning, stretching, and drying they can make the furs they do catch yield them a maximum of returns. For instance the First National Fur show offering $5,000 in cash awards for well handled furs is now being sponsored by the Sears, Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. The purpose of the show is two fold. It encourages better preparation of pelts for market and discourages the taking of furs out of season. Movements such as this are constantly bringing the benefits of conservation before the eyes of trappers and it is hoped that some day the slogan "Every trapper his own game warden" will be a reality.

Peder O. Reierson

Funeral services were held on Wednesday of last week from the Scandinavian Evangelical Free church in Thief River Falls for Peder O. Reierson, 84, who died at the home of his son, T. J. Reierson, of that city, Monday, January 2. Rev. J. O. Jacobson and Rev. Thev. Myhrer of Newfolden officiated and interment was made in Greenwood cemetery.

Mr. Reierson was born in Sigdal, Norway, November 30, 1848, and came from there to Wisconsin in 1854. The same year he moved to Houston County where he lived until 1882 when he moved to Grand Forks, N. Dakota. From there he moved to Marshall county where he homesteaded on a farm in Newfolden township. He retired from active farming several years ago and moved into Holt where he resided until 1927 when he moved to Thief River where he has lived since with his son.

He was married in 1878 at Spring Grove to Annie Sollum who preceded him in death. Their golden anniversary was celebrated in the spring of 1928. Four sons and one daughter have also preceded him in death.

Surviving relatives are two son, Tilford J. and Peder P. Reierson of Thief River; two daughters, Mrs. C. J. Sorenson Holt, and Mrs. L. P. Poppenhagen of Thief River; two sisters, Mrs. Hans Nohre and Mrs. Syver Nohre both of Spring Grove, and 26 grandchildren and four great-grandchildren.

NATION'S LAW MAKERS SEEN AS HARD WORKERS

OUTLINING legislative procedure, Robert V. Fleming, President Riggs National Bank, Washington, D. C., gave the recent convention of the American Bankers Association a description of the difficulties and problems confronting the law-makers. Mr. Fleming said in part:

"The most important part of organization of the two branches of congress is election of standing committees. There are 34 standing committees in the Senate and 46 in the House. These are the workshops of Congress and the real work of lawmaking is done in Committee Rooms.

"The task of legislating for 124,000,000 people is a tremendous one. Of recent years approximately 20,000 bills are introduced annually in the two Houses. Only a small percentage become law, but they must be weighed in committee, accepted or rejected, perhaps amended, reported out, and then considered on the floor.

"Lawmaking involves about 99% of hard and unspectacular work and about 1% of oratory. Few tasks appear so easy and are so difficult as enactment of sound and satisfactory legislation. Few individuals in any line of activity work harder or longer hours than the chairmen of the important committees during a session. I have great sympathy for the members of Congress whose constituents expect undivided attention to every piece of legislation in which they may be interested. From my personal observation, they earnestly and conscientiously endeavor to do all that is humanly possible.

Public Hearings

"When a bill is introduced, referred to committee and printed the next step, if it is a measure of considerable importance, is to conduct a public hearing. The committee makes an effort to listen to anyone who cares to be heard either for or against a measure, although witnesses are frequently limited as to time. Members of the Cabinet and other officials of the administrative departments of the Government usually testify on measures in which they are interested and furnish the committee information in executive session or otherwise. In this way the Administration takes a prominent part in shaping legislation.

"Due to pressure of work and the fact that it is impossible for members of Congress to be technical experts on every subject of legislation, the committees are inclined to give consideration to the merits of arguments presented in testimony and the recommendations of the Cabinet and other officials. It is therefore highly desirable, both from the standpoint of Congress as well as those affected by proposed legislation, that the latter have an opportunity to discuss frankly the effects of such legislation.

"We sometimes complain about the technicalities of legislation, but when we observe organized minorities endeavoring to force class legislation through one House it is a comfort to know such measures may be caught in the meshes of technical procedure in the other and there suffer what is termed automatic asphyxiation."

Building for the Future

Planning and building for the future is what makes a business successful.

What we want to do is to build for the future patronage of every producer of cream, poultry and eggs of the community.

The average cream station is not building up the future cream market of the community in which they operate, but instead are instrumental in tearing down the dairy industry. "In what manner?" you may ask. In encouraging the marketing of poor quality cream—resulting in a poor quality of cream—resulting in a poor quality of butter being put on the market, which decreases consumption of butter and causes surpluses and low prices.

Two Children Die in Blizzard

According to the Grand Forks Herald, the worst blizzard in recent years, Tuesday afternoon's storm, resulted in the death of Jennie and Mildred Skjordal, 16 and 11 years respectively, of Kennedy, Minn.

The girls had attended school at Kennedy and were being taken to their home 2½ miles southwest of town by their father, in a closed cutter, when the pole of the cutter broke. Unhitching the horses, they abandoned the cutter and attempted to follow the horses, but were able to keep them in sight but a short time, and Skjordal and his daughters were soon hopelessly lost.

The girls became exhausted, and for a time Skjordal changed off carrying them until he, too, became exhausted. Then he cleared a spot on the ground to protect them as much as possible, and set off alone.

Skjordal reached a farm three hours after the three had left school. He had wandered three miles from where he had left the girls.

Searching parties were immediately formed, and the bodies of the girls were found at 10.30 that night, three-quarters of a mile from the Skjordal home.

Skjordal's face and hands were badly frozen, but he will recover, physicians said.

The Minnesota Co-operative Wool Growers association announced last week that it expects this month to dispose of its unsold balance of 200,000 pounds of wool, and that it appears likely a final accounting of sales will be made next month. The hope was expressed that final returns would net the growers approximately 13 cents for clear bright medium grades, which would mean a substantial additional payment to the figure advanced during the buying season last year.

Death of Ole Reierson

The people of this community were shocked on Wednesday to hear of the death of Ole Reierson, 69 year old pioneer here. Mr. Reierson retired a few months ago from active farming, and rented the Young home in town where he was taking life easy.

Tuesday afteroon he made his regular visit up around town and appeared as usual in the best of health. After he got back to the house in the evening he went about doing his chores and was outside getting in wood at seven o'clock when he fell dead from heart attack. Thinking that he stayed out longer than usual, his youngest son, LeRoy, who was in the house sick at the time, went to look for him and found him near the wood pile. He at once carried him in the house and called Dr. Mellby of Thief River who pronounced his death was from heart trouble.

Funeral services will be held here Saturday at 1 o'clock from the Free Mission church.

"U" Regents Deny Request for Crookston Junior College

Application of the citizens of Crookston for the establishment by the university of a state supported junior college to replace the present Northwest School of Agriculture near that city, "has brought up a major and all-important problem of educational policy" in Minnesota, Dr. L. D. Coffman, president of the University of Minnesota believes. Accompanying the reply of the board of regents, who refused the requests, President Coffman sent a detailed statement of his views on this problem.

He calls Minnesota uniquely fortunate in having a single large state university, whereby it has avoided the cross-purpose, greatly increased expense, and, in many cases, political log-rolling that have come about in the state with more than one institution of the university type.

Not only this, but the national movement, forced in large part by economy and the opportunity for improving public policy, is toward the centralization of state educational machinery, rather than away from it. Dr. Coffman cites North Carolina, Oregon, California and other states as examples of states where great centralization is being effected at this time.

The action of the regents was to disapprove the plan for establishing a junior college at Crookston "at state expense" In their discussion of the problem they made it clear that they believe junior colleges are part of the local, secondary system, and should be financed as that system is.

The president's statement declares that no such change should be contemplated until or unless an impartial investigation of state education in Minnesota, made by a body of experts from outside the state, to a committee from the legislature, might have been conducted. His statement further declares that there is serious doubt that the university would be within its rights in establishing an institution of the junior college type at Crookston.

That the creation of a junior college there would probably destroy the present school of agriculture, established to serve technical and vocational needs of a farming district, was further pointed out.

General Sales Tax Killed by Roosevelt's Opposition—Other Ways of Balancing the Budget Sought—Samuel Insull Freed by Greek Court.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

PRESIDENT-ELECT ROOSEVELT has killed the general sales tax, for this session of congress at least, and Representative James W. Collier, chairman of the house ways and means committee, is trying to devise some other method of balancing the budget. In this effort he is being earnestly aided by Speaker Garner and the other Democratic leaders in congress. They placed emphasis on economy in appropriating government funds, examining closely the fixed expenditures, that amount to more than one billion dollars. Also they renewed their fight to bring about the legalization and taxation of beer.

Rep. Collier

When Mr. Roosevelt was told in Albany that Washington reports said he was in favor of the sales tax he expressed, through a spokesman, his "horror" at the story, so Mr. Garner and the house Democratic leaders, who had said they would approve such a levy if it were necessary to balance the budget, abandoned the plan. The dispatches from Albany indicated that Mr. Roosevelt might exert pressure on congress to defeat the scheme if it were not dropped. He considers sales tax plans as belonging to two categories, the general manufacturers' sales tax, which he opposes, and the tax on special commodities such as the federal taxes now being collected on gasoline and tobacco, which he thinks should be continued for the present.

The house ways and means committee planned to begin on January 3 an exhaustive study of federal financing with Secretary Mills of the treasury appearing before it to give his views. Both Mr. Mills and President Hoover have recommended a sales tax to balance the budget.

Senate Democratic leaders, however, have expressed doubt that such a levy could be passed in that branch, and they have decided to make no efforts to attach financial legislation to the Collier beer bill as a rider.

REPORTS have been frequent that President Hoover would veto the Democratic beer and farm relief legislation and in this connection Senator Robinson, Democratic leader of the upper chamber, said in a statement that the Republican administration was engaging "in a policy of partisan political obstruction to prevent the enactment of legislation, apparently with the idea of forcing the incoming President to call a special session."

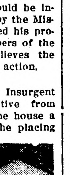
As a matter of fact, observers in Washington were of the opinion that a special session cannot now be avoided.

SENATOR PAT HARRISON of Mississippi, ranking Democrat on the senate finance committee, announced that after the holidays he would introduce a resolution providing that a senate committee should hold a conference with the nation's best economists, financiers and statesmen, to find the way to restore economic order.

Harrison's idea would include a study "of the whole economic situation, with a view primarily of obtaining constructive suggestions from leading economists, financiers and statesmen as to methods and policies to restore economic stability."

Such subjects as currency stabilization, inflation and silver would be included in the investigation by the Mississippian, who has discussed his proposal informally with members of the finance committee. He believes the senate would favor prompt action.

F. H. LA GUARDIA, the insurgent Republican representative from New York, introduced in the house a resolution to provide for the placing of capital on a five-day week basis by reducing the legal interest rate in the District of Columbia and the territories to 3 per cent, to reduce the interest rate on government securities by 29 per cent, and to cut the discount rate of government agencies to a maximum of 2⅞ per cent.



Rep. F. H. La Guardia

The New York representative maintains interest rates today are untenably high when compared with the earning power of the people and that they must come down. He said he purposely drafted his resolution in simple language and had used the five-day week illustration "so that even our bankers could understand it."

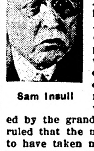
FIVE members of the senate judiciary committee have been appointed by Chairman Norris to consider the Black five-day work week bill, and hearings were announced to begin on January 5. The measure, which was introduced by Senator Black of Alabama, would limit the hours of labor on goods produced for interstate shipment to 30 a week; with six hours a day for five days. Norris, Robinson, Borah, Walsh and Black are the subcommittee, and they will take extensive testimony as to both the desirability of the legislation and its constitutionality.

QUICK work on the major appropriation bills went on in the house of representatives. The Interior department bill carrying $43,652,904 for the fiscal year 1904 was passed after $460,000 had been added for a heating plant at Howard university, the federally supported institution for negroes in Washington. In doing this 26 northern Democrats overrode the Democratic leadership and voted with the Republicans for the amendment. The house then went on to consider the Agriculture department supply bill.

The senate was in recess until Friday, but attempts were made to begin formal consideration of the Collier beer bill by the judiciary committee headed by Senator Norris.

WHILE the congressmen were struggling with their problems, President Hoover and his party were sailing down the Florida coast, trying to find good fishing, but with small success. They made various stops but did not go ashore, receiving local dignitaries at the docks. At St. Augustine Mayor Mickler and a lot of other officials greeted the Chief Executive at the boat's rail and Mrs. Hoover received lovely bouquets, one sent by Governor Carlton and the other presented by Girl Scouts. Mail and telegrams that came aboard from time to time, some of them relating to the war debts, gave the President occasional work and took his mind off the poor angling until the vicinity of Miami was reached, where the big fish were biting better.

SAMUEL INSULL, the fallen utilities magnate, was set free by the Greek Court of Appeals that considered the request of the American government that he be extradited, and he is at liberty to remain in Greece or go to another country he may prefer. After deliberating two hours the court in Athens held that no evidence had been presented that Insull was guilty of the offenses of grand larceny and embezzlement of $172,000, for which he was indicted by the grand jury in Chicago. It ruled that the money he was alleged to have taken might be considered a loan contracted for the benefit of the corporations involved, and that Insull obtained from it no personal profit, but acted in good faith. Greek lawyers and officials of the American legation said the decision was absolutely binding, and the latter indicated that the United States government would make no further efforts to extradite Insull on the evidence at hand.



Sam Insull

The people of Athens rejoiced in the verdict of the Appeals court, loudly cheering Insull and "Greek justice." They felt that the incident was a fine example of a small nation refusing to knuckle down to one of the great powers.

ALARMED by the flight of money from the Union of South Africa, which has increased greatly of late, the government at Pretoria took emergency steps to remain on the gold standard. The cabinet, headed by Premier J. B. M. Hertzog, issued a decree forbidding all export of gold. It also withdrew sovereigns from circulation to prevent hoarding.

Premier Hertzog has waged a steady fight to hold South Africa to gold for more than a year, declaring that the country would resemble a ship in a stormy sea without an anchor if it departed from the yellow metal. He maintains that inflation would depreciate gold to its pure commodity value, thereby benefiting the mines, but not the rest of the country.

PROMINENT among those taken by death during the week was Brig. Gen. John J. Carty, retired, vice president and chief engineer of the American Telephone and Telegraph company. He died in Baltimore at the age of seventy-one years. General Carty was credited with many important developments in the fields of telephonic, telegraphic and radio communication. During the war he was director of telephone and telegraph communications for the American army in France.

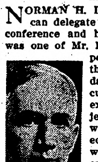
Norman E. Mack, New York member of the Democratic national committee for 32 years and former publisher of the Buffalo Times, died in Buffalo, aged seventy-four. He was one of the best loved of all Democratic leaders.

Col. Richard S. Hooker, commander of the American marines stationed in Shanghai, died suddenly at his home in that city while playing with his children.

THOUGH Japan, like all other nations, is hard up, its budget is the largest in its history, and in a statement to the diet the army office sought to explain why the military expenditures must be increased. The military system is to be readjusted and improved in four ways. The forces in Manchuria will be augmented, while those in Japan will be reduced as much as possible. Supplementary military education will be extended and improved. Army organizations are to be bettered in various ways. Supplies, such as munitions and uniforms, must be replenished.

Probably the only important business the diet will transact is the adoption of the budget. The disgruntled Seiyukai party hesitates to oust Premier Saito, though it could do so, and that gentleman is careful to propose a minimum of legislation. Korekiyo Takahashi, finance minister, has announced his intention to ask power to control the exchanges, but has not indicated the method of control he proposes to adopt. The flight of capital takes the form of export of goods, the value of which is left abroad to cover purchases of raw materials. How this can be checked unless export trade is controlled is not clear.

NORMAN H. DAVIS, chief American delegate to the disarmament conference and himself a Democrat, was one of Mr. Roosevelt's most important callers during the week. For two days the two men discussed privately and exhaustively the subjects of disarmament, war debts and world economics, in all of which Mr. Davis is an expert. In the course of the conversations Mr. Davis told the President-Elect that he believed disarmament is necessary to a restoration of world confidence and credit and said he thought important steps had been taken toward reduction of armament. This, in turn, he predicted, would have a favorable effect on efforts for a successful world economic conference.



N. H. Davis

The first step, he said, would be to persuade France and Italy to indorse the terms of the London naval agreement of 1930, particularly regarding submarine construction. Disarmament advocates, he stated, believed they could ban submarines in spite of the objections of France and Japan, or at least limit them to coastal defense.

Then, by outlawing offensive weapons, poison gas, mobile heavy artillery and bombing airplanes and banning the manufacture of aerial bombs, the world would be ready to work toward restoration of confidence.

Mr. Roosevelt expressed the view that world security would return as the deadly instruments of war were reduced and mentioned that the late Premier Clemenceau of France had once told him that "the one essential for France out of the World war was security."

"I asked him for his definition of security," Mr. Roosevelt said. "He replied that for a thousand years no French babies had been born and gone through life to three score and ten without knowing some kind of trouble with Germany. Since that was true, he said, the guaranty of no war with Germany would constitute security for the French. I think that belief is still there."

CANADA'S sensational libel case came to an end in Montreal with the conviction of James J. Harpell, publisher of the Journal of Commerce, on charges of defamatory libel of T. B. Macauley, the aged president of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, largest organization of its kind in the British empire. Harpell was sentenced to three months in jail and to pay the costs of the prosecution. Harpell filed an appeal and was released on bail.

Chief Justice Greenshields, who presided at the trial, pointed out that four of the five days of the trial were give to the defense to prove the charges against Macauley. He also recalled how Harpell had declared in opera court that Macauley was a "crook."

"You," said the chief justice to the accused, "absolutely failed in one scintilla of proof in your attempt to prove that he was a crook, not to say a swindler. You had no justification, not the slightest, for the publication of those atrocious libels against a man who has occupied an honorable position in Montreal for well nigh half a century."

ONE of the major mining disasters of the year occurred at Moweaqua, Ill., when an explosion imprisoned 54 coal miners beyond all hope of rescue. For a week their fellow workers dug frantically to get to the doomed men, but all they found were lifeless bodies. At the time of writing the corpses of all but seven of the men had been brought to the surface. The little town was stricken by the tragedy, which left there 33 widows with a total of 75 children.

PAUL REDFERN, an American aviator who in August, 1927, left Fort Brunswick, Ga., on a nonstop flight to Rio de Janeiro and disappeared, is now said to have been discovered in the upper Amazon region. Charles Hasler, an American engineer who recently arrived from the hinterlands at a locality on the Tapajoz river near the Ford concession, said Redfern is now in the Rio Maior zone near Humayta village on the right shore of the Maderia river and is enjoying perfect health among the Parantin Indians.

The Fable of the Go-Getting Smarty

By GEORGE ADE

(©. Bell Syndicate.)—WNU Service.

ONCE there lived in the Western Hemisphere a Citizen who was easy to get along with if you would let him have his Way, take Orders from him and not sass back. There was no tarnation Sense in any one having an Argument with this Bird, because he was always Right. It almost stupefied him if some Upstart, with a Disposition like a Mule, suggested to him that possibly he was not One Hundred Per Cent Infallible.

Yes, he was one of those chesty Ikes who are apt to get Results in a World largely peopled with Procrastinators, Hesitators, Doubters and Back-Pedalers, but he would have been an Awful Thing to room with.

Imagine being all the Time with one who tells you when to Bathe, how many Towels to use, what to order for Lunch, how many Studs to wear with the Bob-Tail, on which side to part the Locks and what Books to con before turning out the Light. Also keen enough under the Hat to win every Battle if any one finds Fault with a single Item in his Program. At no time endeavoring to conceal the Fact that he is a Superman, generating his own Aureole of Superiority.

Even as a Lad, in the weather beaten School House and on the Village Common, he was Czar and Dictator. He appointed himself such and banished to Outer Darkness all those who questioned his Rule. Every Day the down-trodden Worms would get together and mumble a lot of Threats and organize a Mutiny, but when it came time for the Uprising there never was a Leader who dared to meet Julius in the Arena.

If ever Imperial Caesar looked down from the Battlements, he must have been proud of his Namesake.

We are said to be Free and Equal. It would be hard to say which half of the foregoing Joke is entitled to the louder Laugh.

He Has a Through Ticket.

When you discover in a Grammar School a square-jawed Lad with Steely Eyes, of Whom the Teacher stands in Awe, look out for him. It simply means that he has a Through Ticket for the Stock Exchange, the U. S. Senate or the Gallows.

Even as a Squirrel cannot be kept on the Ground, so it is impossible to keep any Napoleon in a Side Pocket.

When he appeared on the Campus of that undersized but ambitious Institution of Learning known as Goble College and began to Swank all over the Place, the infuriated Undergraduates called a Secret Meeting and voted that nothing would cure him except a Dip in the Horse-Tank.

So he called the Freshmen together and told them just what he expected from them in the way of Co-Operation. He said that if they would obey Orders, the Class of Umpty-Ump would be the brightest Jewel in the Diadem of dear old Goble.

So they elected him Class President and he told them what the Colors and the Yell would be and they all went mooching back to their Rooms to whisper among themselves and declare that they wouldn't stand for it.

They were in a State of Revolt except when in the immediate Presence of his hypnotic Personality and then the Complex of Inferiority got a Strangle Hold on the Ego and they knew that Gnats could not argue with an Eagle.

When he finally picked out a good Eugenic Specimen of fourplus Pulchritude and decide to permit her to be the Mother of his Children, he did not propose at all. He patted her on the shoulder and told her to brace herself and not give way to joyful Emotions, even though she was about to be the recipient of Good News. In putting her Wise to the Fact that she had drawn the Capital Prize he impersonated the King who pauses on the Highway to bestow a Coin on a barefooted Peasant Girl.

Irene had vowed that before she signed up he would have to unstarch himself and get down on his knees and talk purty, but when the Big Moment came she was just as cool and defiant as a small Bird in the presence of a large and energetic Snake.

He somehow had the mesmeric Power to convince Folks that any one who didn't fall in with his Suggestions was guilty of Lese Majestie, Contempt of Court and Moral Delinquency.

Had to Wipe His Feet.

Julius went into the Practice of Law and the first Client who walked into his Office had to wipe his feet on the Mat and dig up a Retaining Fee. He had the Option of doing that or going somewhere else and hiring a second-class Dub.

How the other Attorneys hated Julius! Why? Because, when they opened up on him with all their Heavy Artillery, Bombs and Shrapnel, he would be reading a Letter and not aware that Opposing Counsel were present. The most they ever got out of him was a Smile indicative more of Pity than of Anger. After they had hollered themselves hoarse and supplicated the Court and massaged the Jury, then Julius would arise and explain What was What in Language which was feebly imitated some time ago by William Shakespeare, Lord Macaulay and Daniel Webster. And, somehow, before he got through, all of the Listeners would be convinced that they were listening to the Chief Justice.

The Average Lawyer cannot tell you, definitely, his Wife's First Name until after he has gone to the Office and looked at a couple of Books. Julius knew what the Authorities had to say before they said it.

The Barristers with defective Ignition and no Self-Starters found it hard going when they tried to regulate the activities of a bounding Intellectual Gazelle whose Intuition was about Three Weeks in Advance of their carefully figured-out Dope.

Julius shone with especial Luster when he had a Board of Directors eating from the Hand. He was the kind of Legal Adviser who always felt that he could get a better Line on the Workings of the Company which employed him if he owned quite a Block of the Stock. And no matter what they slipped him, it was always with the Understanding that they were mighty lucky to secure the Services of the ne plus ultra Crackerjack of the Twentieth Century.

Julius rode down the Appian Way in a Golden Chariot drawn by 24 White Horses while all of the Chair-Warmers and Checker Players and Culls and Misfits and Dumb Bells said it was a Crime the way he was getting the Breaks, which he was.

You surround Mount Everest with Ant Hills and Mount Everest is going to be lonesome. No one can be chummy with a lot of Pigmies who are only Knee high. Julius had a Host of envious Admirers but very few Pals and those who were his Close Friends needed only Blue Suits, Short Pencils and Freckles to make them regular Messenger Boys.

Julius was always the incomparable It without making any apparent Effort to overshadow his Environment. He took the Center of the Stage because the Minor Actors backed away at his regal Approach and tried to hide behind the Scenery.

Functioned at Top Speed.

Inasmuch as all normal Adults are missing on most of the Cylinders, it was no Miracle that one who functioned at Top Speed and was absolutely minus all Doubts and Fears should become a Leader by Common Consent, and then be privately hated by all of the Second-Raters.

One of our prize Delusions is that men who acquire extreme Unpopularity are seldom successful and happy. To get the Cold Facts play the Reverse English. The handshaking Greeters who achieve Popularity are often elected to Office, with the Result that they are neither happy nor financially prosperous. They get their Pictures in the Papers and finally are buried by Popular Subscription.

One of the real Satisfactions which followed Julius through his Meteoric Career arose from the Knowledge that he was thoroughly detested because of his Wealth, his Wardrobe, his Town House, his Fleet of Motor Cars, his suite of Offices, his princely Income and his Magnetic Control of all surrounding Circumstances.

He could hear the Buzz of the Detractors below but he never saw the Knockers, because he always wore his Head tilted back and was giving a correct Imitation of Ajax defying the Lightning.

It would have broken his Heart if the perspiring Commoners had ever hailed him as an Equal. He wanted to be in the Ether while they were crawling in the Mud, and the fullest Vindication of his Career was that no one ever asked him to be a Candidate for Anything. He had no Time to hold Office. He was too busy telling the Office-Holders what to do.

It is said that the Funeral Procession was over a Mile long, with 240 Cars, and in every Car at least four happy Mourners who were swapping Stories about Julius and his superlative Egotism and offensive Eccentricities.

The lofty Monument for which he provided in his Will, knowing that the Beloved Ones could not be trusted, is 80 feet high and is visible by many Sight-Seers who stand around and recall that, even though he was ornery and stuck up, he batted 1,000, never was caught on Bases and hadn't a single Error marked up against him. No wonder the Hatreds survive.

There are all sort of Guesses as to what became of him. Some think he is the Gatti-Casazza of the Heavenly Choir and others feel sure that he is President of a Heating Plant. Wherever he is, he has a Swivel Chair and a big Desk with Flowers on it.

MORAL—The easiest Thing in the World to get and the hardest to cash on is Three Hearty Cheers.

Old-Time Smoke Nuisance

The smoke abatement war has been going on for centuries. London had a "smoke nuisance" back in 1661, which was so acute that John Evelyn, famous diarist of the time, wrote a detailed pamphlet on the subject, called "Fumifugium, or the Inconvenience of the Aer and the Smoake of London Dissipated." Dedicated "To His Sacred Majesty Charles II," the book blamed "brewers, diers, lime burners, salt and sope boylers" for the trouble, and advocated that the trades which caused the nuisance be removed five or six miles out of the city. King Charles was so impressed that he asked Evelyn to prepare a bill to solve the problem, but they played politics even in those days, and the measure never reached the statute books.—Wall Street Journal.

Stones of Odd Shapes Relics of Bygone Race?

Three curious pieces of stone, which may possibly be relics of an ancient people, form part of a Rotura (New Zealand) collection. Two of the pieces, one of which is almost an exact miniature of the other, are shaped almost like solid pitchers. They are rounded as if turned on a potter's wheel and, although they cannot have been devised as vessels, appear to have been fashioned by some human agency. Both pieces are a species of sandstone, and were found by Mr. Kean in the Wairoa district at the bottom of deep outcrops of river metal, between 35 and 40 feet below the surface. The third piece is petrified wood, weighing several pounds. On both ends are cuts which have obviously been made with a species of ax. This piece was found with the larger of the two pestles, and from the depth at which it was found must have been buried for a very long period of time.

"N-not quite that bad. But it was pretty dreadful."

As she spoke there came the crack of a gun from somewhere on ahead, and then another and a third. Betty put her hands to her ears and said, "Dear me! are we going to get into more of it?"

"I guess not," said Smith. "I'm inclined to think that was Harding, trying to stop those fellows."

A mile or more farther on they found the sheriff and two of his deputies standing in the road, Markham pulled up and waited, and Smith got out of his car and walked on to speak to the sheriff.

"My guess was right," he said, when he came back. "They went by here, merely hitting the high spots, and Harding tried to stop them; shot at their tires but apparently missed the mark. Anyhow, they didn't stop. I told Harding what they did to you, and he says he'll try to trail the scoundrels and bring 'em to book. I guess we're safe to go on to town, now."

A few minutes' fast driving brought them to the bridge over the Timanyoni; and Smith's car turned off to the railroad station. The fast drive had been made in silence, but after Markham had helped his seatmate out at the curb the young woman broke it.

"Wally, where could I find you or Owen quickly, if I should need to?" she asked.

"Why, we are at the Hophra house, as you know."

"Yes; but you are not there all the time."

Markham did a bit of quick thinking.

"Are you asking seriously, Betty?"

"Yes. Don't ask me why. I can't tell you—yet. But—"

"I'll promise that one or the other of us will always be within reach of the hotel phone. Will that do?"

"Yes, thank you. Good night."

He waited until he had seen her mounting the porch steps before he drove away toward the business district. On the way he was wondering why she had made her singular request, and he was still wondering after he had put his car up and was entering the lobby of the hotel.

Looking for Landis, he crossed to the counter. The key to their suite was in its pigeonhole, which meant that Landis had not gone upstairs. Markham spoke to the clerk.

"Seen anything of Mr. Landis?"

"You don't know where he went?"

"No, I—hold on, yes I do, too. Mr. Starbuck phoned for him from his office across the street, and he went over there."

"What's that?" Markham snapped. "Mr. Starbuck isn't in town. He went to Copah last night to meet his wife and daughter!"

"He must have returned," said the clerk. "The operator said the phone call was from him."

Markham turned away vaguely disturbed. An attempt had been made to kidnap him, and only the opportune appearance of Smith's car had made it fail. Had a similar attempt been made to trap Landis? As he hesitated, he saw Smith talking to three of the lately arrived guests at the cigar stand. He turned to the clerk and asked if he knew the names of the three who were with Smith.

"I do, for a fact. They are the three gentlemen you were asking about when you came, a week ago; Mr. Fleming, Mr. Cantrell and Mr. Martin, from Louisville. They have just come in on the Nevada Flyer."

"Not driving?"

"No; they started out to drive and came part of the way by motor. But they had bad luck with their car and left it at one of their stopovers."

Markham looked again at the three men. Not in any single particular did they resemble the three who had been registering under the same names halfway across the continent, and whom he and Landis had seen leaving the lobby of the Copah hotel in company with Canby.

CHAPTER XI

The Surgeon's Kit

At the discovery that the three men talking with Smith were by no means the three who had traveled in the Fleetwing, Markham's first impulse was to introduce himself promptly, for the purpose of telling Smith's friends what he knew. Then he remembered that he had no proof to offer, since the three name forgers had disappeared.

His next thought was to go in search of Landis. As he went toward the hotel entrance, he saw Canby step out of an elevator and go quickly to shake hands with the new arrivals, and noticed that Smith waved the three a good night and turned away—a bit of byplay that seemed to say that he did not care to be identified with Canby. Markham stepped out upon the sidewalk and glanced up at the mine office windows. They were lighted, and he crossed the street and climbed the stair to the second floor suite.

The door was opened by an elderly man in his shirt sleeves.

"Mr. Starbuck," said Markham; "is he here?"

"Not now," was the prompt reply; and then, "You are Mr. Markham? I'm glad to see you. I was just going to phone the hotel to find out if you had come in. You are needed. Word came a little while ago that Professor Lawson had been hurt by a landslide up at those fossil beds, and Mr. Starbuck got Mr. Landis and a doctor and started up there in his car. A few minutes ago they phoned and asked me to find you and send you after them with this," picking up a black bag. "It's the doctor's instruments. Must have left them here when he came up with Mr. Starbuck."

"How badly is Doctor Lawson hurt?" he asked.

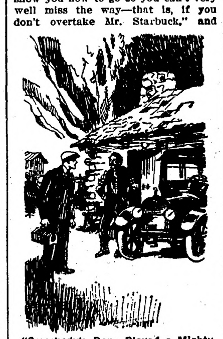
"Pretty badly, I judge."

"Has his daughter been told? She is stopping with the Stillings."

"They didn't call her up. Mr. Starbuck and Mr. Landis both agreed that it was better not to tell her until they found out just how bad it is."

"Where is this fossil place? Can I find it in the night?"

"Maybe you won't need to; maybe you'll overtake the other car. I can show you how to go so you can't very well miss the way—that is, if you don't overtake Mr. Starbuck," and upon a sheet of scratch paper the elderly man sketched a rude outline map, penciling in the road that Markham should take with the various right and left turns indicated by guiding arrows. "Not much of a map," he apologized, "but maybe it will do."



"Somebody's Done Played a Mighty Mean Joke on You, I Reckon."

Markham picked up the black bag, saying, "If they telephone again, tell them I'm on the way and will try to overtake them."

At the hotel garage he called for his roadster and told the night man to fill the tank. He got in to place the car for the filling, keeping his seat until the man finished and came around for his pay. For this reason a dark figure had its chance to slip unseen from the shadows of a nearby doorway, to stoop for a brief moment at the rear of the car, and thereafter to vanish as swiftly and silently as it had come.

Once across the bridge and headed northward, Markham let the roadster out. He was glad the bookkeeper had told him that Starbuck and Landis had not passed the distressing news on to Betty; thus saving her a long and heartbreaking interval of anxiety and uncertainty before the worst could be known.

For a time nothing intervened to make him slacken speed. With the paved road left behind, however, Markham's difficulties began, and he had to get out the scratch-paper map and follow its markings. But after he had made the first two or three arrow-indicated turns a speed slackening became strictly obligatory. The road was now degenerating into a country cart track among the hills.

Spurred on by the sharp necessities, Markham kept the roadster in motion, shifting gears only when he was obliged to. In this manner he had made something over twenty speedometer miles of the bad going before he came to the end. On one of the rockiest of the hills the motor coughed a few times and stalled, and not for any switchings-on of the starter would it yield another explosion.

He got his flashlight and climbed out to investigate. So far as he could determine, the ignition system was in perfect condition. Next, he tested the fuel feed by trying to flood the carburetor—but it wouldn't flood. With a malediction on his ill luck, he took off his coat, got out the tool kit, and began to take things apart to probe for the trouble.

Though he was a fairly good mechanician, the probing process proved to be a glutton of time, and a long period of what he could well imagine might be a life and death delay for Betty's father was wasted before he had satisfied himself that neither the gas line nor the vacuum tank was responsible for the power failure. It was only as a last resort that he went to look at the gas tank gauge. But a single aiming of the flashlight at gauge was enough. Though he was assured that he had left Brewster with a supply of gasoline which should have taken him five or six times the distance he had traveled, the tank was now empty. The small drain cock in the tank bottom was partly open, with the last residue of the liquid fuel still dripping from it.

Under other conditions, and in view of what had already happened to him and Landis since leaving Carthage, his suspicions would doubtless have been awakened at once. But laboring under the burden of his responsibility as a doctor's messenger he thought of nothing else, and the half-open drain cock merely suggested one of the many road accidents that may happen.

Obsessed by the thought that the life of Betty's father might be hangng in the balance for the lack of the instruments in the surgeon's bag, he snatched it and the penciled map out of the car, and with the flashlight for a lantern, started on afoot.

Hour after hour he pushed over a road which finally became no road at all, but upon which he could occasionally see the tracks of an automobile.

It was these faint tire marks that kept him going, and it was not until the graying dawn found him halting to stare at a way-worn car drawn up in front of a log cabin beside the road, which here ended abruptly, that the suspicion that he had been cleverly victimized struck him.

Before he could recover from the blow the cabin door opened and an unshaven, gray-haired man came out to voice astonishment at finding that he had a visitor.

"Well, well, stranger! Where on top of earth did you tumble from?" he called out.

Briefly, and hurriedly, Markham explained, and the gray-haired one laughed.

"Somebody's done played a mighty mean joke on you, I reckon. Ther' ain't nothin' the matter with old Doctor Bonehunter, as we call him. He was down here yiste'day to see if I wouldn't drive the Lizzie to town and fetch him out some more picks and shovels. The place where he's bone-diggin' is only about six mile on through the hills. He ain't hurt none. No! I reckon it's a joke, and I'll say it was a mighty mean one. You been trampin' all night?"

"A good part of it," said Markham, convinced now that he had been gotten out of Brewster by subterfuge. Then, overwhelmed by a sudden realization of what the plot might mean not only to himself, but also to Landis and possibly to Betty, "It isn't a joke; it's the way a bunch of crooks took to get me out of town and lost in these hills. You've got a car and it will be worth a hundred dollar bill to you to get me back to my car and give me gas enough to run me to Brewster. Will you do it?"

"If I had the gas I wouldn't hold you up for no robbin' deal like that. But I ain't got it; don't reckon I got more'n enough to run to some place where I kin borra enough to get in with. More'n that, I got to do a little tinkerin' on the Lizzie afore she'll run. You come on in an' we'll see what-all we kin do with the li'l' old buzz-wagon."

Markham entered the cabin with his host and helped him cook a breakfast of bacon and pan-bread. He learned that his entertainer was a prospector, and that his name was Jackson Griggs; also that he knew Starbuck well. "Sure, I know Billy," was the way he put it; "knowed him when he used to punch cows in 'other end o' the Park."

After breakfast they fell upon the outworn flivver. The old machine was little more than a wreck; overhauling killed all of the forenoon before it was completed; a period in which Markham's anxiety became a maddening thorn in the flesh.

What had the plotters, whoever they were, been doing in his absence? What had they done to Landis? That Owen, too, had been put out of the way, he could not doubt for a moment. That was the meaning of the telephone call which had taken Landis out of the hotel—a call doubtless sent by the gray-haired accomplice who had gained access to the Little Alice offices and had posed as the bookkeeper. Then there was Betty. Wasn't her danger as great as that which menaced Landis and himself? For she knew—she must know—that she was the one who, at Canby's instigation, had opened Owen's safe for the abstraction of the black box.

At the long last the car consented to run, and the return to Brewster was begun. It was a slow business over the wretched road, and Markham's need of sleep was so overpowering that he slept in his seat most of the way.

As Griggs had predicted, he had barely gas enough to enable them to reach the first house on the paved road; but here they borrowed enough to make the run to town. At the hotel entrance Markham pressed a liberal reward upon the old prospector and hurried in. As he passed through the revolving doors a man accosted him. It was Stillings; and before he spoke, Markham had read the story of anxious worry in his face.

"Miss Betty!" said the lawyer quickly. "Do you know what has become of her?"

"I left her at your house last night about nine o'clock. Do you mean to say—"

"She didn't go into the house," Stillings interrupted sharply. "You didn't see her go in, did you?"

Stillings explained rapidly.

"We were out for a call on one of the neighbors, and when Miss Betty telephoned to say that you were staying at Hillcrest for dinner, Mrs. Stillings told her to look under the mat for the door key if she returned before we did. We were back by half-past nine, and the key was where we left it and there was no one in the house but the servants, who had gone to bed. The natural supposition was that Miss Betty was staying the night with the Smiths; but when we tried to call up and find out, we were told the line was out of order. Then we tried to get you here at the hotel, and were told you'd been in and had gone out again."

News of Minnesota
EVENTS of the week throughout the "State of Ten Thousand Lakes" told in brief form

Minneapolis—Population of Minneapolis is estimated at 481,700.

Montrose—Fire completely destroyed the local postoffice and a barber shop.

Minneapolis — Nature's Christmas present to this city was an eight-inch snowfall which covered everything.

Minneapolis—School teachers and the board of education were forced to accept a 16½ per cent cut in pay for 1933.

Windom—Plans are completed for the annual crop show of the Wan-Brot-Cot Association here, January 12, 13 and 14.

Storden—A relief committee has been organized to care for the poor and needy of this community. It is proposed to establish a wood yard also.

Kenyon—Plans are being made by local business men for the organization of a new State bank to take the place of the last bank which closed October 6.

St. Paul—Seventeen changes in the state criminal code designed in general to speed procedure, were approved by the Minnesota State Bar Association here.

Dexter—Otto Groetsch, of Dexter, janitor in the State Capitol building in 1923, is returning as a lawmaker this term, having been elected in the last election.

Crookston—A proposal to expand the Northwest School of Agriculture here into a junior college was rejected by the board of regents of the University of Minnesota.

Breckenridge—This city was out of drinking water and water for fire prevention for several days because of a solid freeze up of the Otter Tail river. An appeal to the power company to open one of its dams caused water to flow again.

Alexandria—Threatening to discontinue their payments on loans if relief is not granted immediately, members of the Douglas County National Farm Loan Association have signed a petition and forwarded it to Senator Henrik Shipstead.

Owatonna—A survey of the local plant of the Tri-State Telephone Co., in connection with the costs of exchange service to 26 Steele county, rural phone companies will be made by experts of the railroad and warehouse commission.

St. Paul—Because of the Smoot-Hawley tariff, Canadians are buying butter and fruits from Australia and New Zealand rather than from the United States, Justice Royal A. Stone of the Minnesota supreme court asserted on his return from a trip to Vancouver, B. C.

St. Paul—A cash deficit of $39,795 was charged against the Minnesota State fair for the fiscal year ending November 30, 1932, Raymond A. Lee, secretary, said in his annual report submitted to Governor Olson. On actual operation of the 1932 state fair, the deficit totaled $78,102.

St. Paul—In an effort to make possible the issuance of $100,000 worth of scrip money by the board of public welfare, special legislation will be drafted and presented to the Ramsey county delegation in the state legislature. The stamp money proposal has been indorsed by several department stores.

Long Lake—Carl Parrish, champion father at the Minneapolis courthouse, passed cigars again in celebration of arrival of his twenty-third child, a daughter, born recently. Mr. Parrish is a deputy sheriff and serves as bailiff for Judge H. D. Dickinson. The latest member of the family weighs nine pounds and was born at the family home at Long Lake.

St. Paul—A governor's message that will urge economy but also will propose at least two new taxes; a state budget that will offer ways to make deep slashes in state expenditures, and completion of organization plans in two houses of the Minnesota legislature—these are items on his program preparing for the opening of the forty-eighth legislative session January 3.

Worthington—The annual ice harvest here is nearing completion. Ice houses have been stocked with 7,000 tons of ice and the ice houses at Brewster, Rushmore and Wilmont have been filled. Now the icemen are cutting 6,000 tons of ice for use by the Omaha railway next summer. The ice harvest this year is between two and three weeks earlier and the average thickness is about 17 inches.

St. Paul—The final drive for control of the lower house of the legislature opened with an aggressive statement by Representative Andrew Finstuen of Kenyon as he returned to his headquarters in St. Paul. He claimed a majority of the house members back of him, though Charles Munn of Osseo, indorsed by the farmer-labor-liberal caucus, is declared by his group to have assurances of support from 85 of the 131 members-elect.

Beautiful French City Keeps Step With Time

An old French proverb says "He who has not seen Blois in lilac time has not experienced the sweetness of living." But it seems better to say that "He who has not seen Blois at any time has missed a great privilege." Here at the Chateau of Blois Francis I inaugurated his career as one of France's greatest builder kings. Blois was the beloved city of Victor Hugo and his father spent the last years of his life here. Ancient lore and legend lurk in every little nook and corner of this historic village, but Blois does not live in the glory of its past. It has kept step in the march of civilization. The stores, or les grande maisons, are up-to-date, the hotels are modern and the train and bus service is excellent. Nor has nature slighted this beloved city of kings, the profusion of flowers scattered hither and yon, the lilt of the lazy, dreamy water of the Loire as it trinkles over the little white cobblestones that shine almost as bright as pearls in the sunshine, is proof of her generosity.—Washington Star.

Better Breakfasts

It was a grand and glorious breakfast—if she does say so, herself. And though the tick-tock registers only 8:30, Letty sings as she dries 'em. The little brown thrush has nothing on her.

Letty has just served a Better Breakfast. She hates so-so breakfasts, and hers are oh! so, so much better. She admits it. Here are her menu and recipes. Do you agree with her?

MENU
Rhubarb
Wheat Cereal
with Crushed Pineapple
Cod Fish Cakes Broiled Bacon
Toasted Buttered Finger Rolls
Hot Beverage

Wheat Cereal with Crushed Pineapple: Cook any light wheat cereal in a double boiler until well done. Serve hot with a spoonful of crushed pineapple in the center. Serve with cream.

Codfish Cakes: Make a white sauce of three-fourths tablespoon butter, three-fourths tablespoon flour and one-half cup milk. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Beat one egg slightly, add the hot sauce slowly, then mix thoroughly with the contents of one 10-ounce can of codfish cakes and let the mixture cool. Drop by spoonfuls into deep fat and fry a golden brown. This makes twelve cakes, and serves six persons.*

Building for the Future

Planning and building for the future is what makes a business successful.

What we want to do is to build for the future patronage of every producer of cream, poultry and eggs of the community.

The average cream station is not building up the future cream market of the community in which they operate, but instead are instrumental in tearing down the dairy industry. "In what manner?" you may ask. In encouraging the marketing of poor quality cream—resulting in a poor quality of cream—resulting in a poor quality of butter being put on the market, which decreases consumption of butter and causes surpluses and low prices.

$4750 Slashed Off Salaries In County Offices

Salary reductions totaling $4,761.65 in addition to lowering of mileage fees and wages for workers on highways were voluntarily made at the annual meeting of the Marshall County Board of Commissioners who closed their annual meeting at Warren last Thursday.

In an effort to ease the burden now confronting the taxpayers and feeling that costs of living had been materially lowered, the members of the county board called into their session last Thursday morning all the officers of the county and following the meeting all officers agreed to the lower salary schedules which are now in effect.

Savings will be effected in every office at the court house and in every department of county administration as a result of the voluntary action taken at the meeting. Salaries of every elective officer were reduced, while cleak hire in practically every office was similarly reduced.

Salaries in the auditor's office were reduced from $5,929.65 in 1932 to $4,500 for 1933. Auditor Johnson accepted a $400 cut in his salary while clerk hire for the year was reduced to $2400.

A $1300 saving was effected in the treasurer's office, salaries being reduced from $4300 to $3000. Treasurer Kvikstad's salary automatically went down to $2,000 because of the lower assessed valuation and he also accepted a $200 reduction from the maximum allowed by law to a flat salary of $1800 a year. Clerk hire for the office was set at $1200 for the year.

Register of Deeds L. M. Olson was also given a $200 reduction to make his salary $1800 per year. The salaries in the office including Mr. Olson's were cut from $3,137 in 1932 to $2,760 this year. Clerk of Court A. C. Swandby took a 10 per cent reduction from $800 per year to $720 per year.

Judge of Probate B. B. Brett's salary was reduced to $2100, while clerk hire was cut similarly, the salaries for the office being $3,200 in 1932 and $2,940 this year.

Sheriff Bordewich accepted a reduction of $200 for the year, his salary decreasing from $2,000 to $1,800, while Marshall Kays, deputy sheriff, will have a cut in salary from $1500 to $1350, the board submitting a recommendation to the District Judge for the cut following Mr. Kays' voluntary acceptance.

County Attorney Braggans' salary was cut from $2250 to $2100, while Nels M. Engen, superintendent of schools, took a cut of $200 from $2,000 to $1,800. Asst. Supt. Miss Hattie Anderson will continue to receive the same salary of $100 a month.

A saving of $125 a year was made in the county commissioner's salary schedule, each commissioner accepting a $25 reduction to $300 a year each. The salary for the Janitress, Mrs. Louisa Anderson, was cut from $1200 to $1020.

H. T. Swanson, highway engineer, accepted a salary reduction from $2160 to $2000, while his assistant, H. I. Knutson, accepted a reduction from $1500 to $1350.

The new salary schedule will total $28,040 while in 1932 the salary schedule totaled $32,801.65.

Wages for patrols on the highways were cut to 35 cents an hour, office help in the engineer's office to 30 cents an hour, outside help to 20 cents an hour and teams to 15 cents an hour. Instrument men were cut to $3.00 per day. Mileage for the sheriff was fixed at 7 cents per mile when only one person is in the car and 10 cents per mile when more than one person is in the car.

Board members also passed a resolution requesting the State Highway department to extend Trunk Highway No. 33 from Warren west to the Red River at Oslo, this road now being maintained as a state aid road. —Warren Sheaf.

Clifford Jarland Honored By National Association

J. Clifford Jorland, Holt, Minn., has been issued a Certificate of Merit by The Holstein-Friesian Association of America in recognition of satisfactory Calf Club work carried on by him. He is the 3465th member of the junior organization of the world's largest dairy cattle association and he is entitled to all privileges of the organization except voting until he is 21 years old. Pedigrees of Holsteins owned by him will be registered and transfer of ownership will be made at members' rates, which are one-half of those charged non-members.

School Buys Cordwood

The local school board let bids on Monday for 90 cords of green split cordwood. There were a number of bids ranging from $1.95 per cord up to $2.50. Most of the 90 cords were bought at the $2.00 mark.

Creamery Buys Ice

The board of directors of the local creamery let the bids for the job of furnishing and packing 120 tons of ice at the creamery on Monday. There were only a few bidders and the lowest one which was for 36 cents a ton went to "Doc" Duckendorf of Theif River Falls.

Personal Property Tax List

We are this week mailing out the official proceedings of the county board of Marshall county as of their annual meeting held the first part of this month.

Also included therewith is the personal property tax list for 1932. Save your copies.

Another Big Snowstorm

On Wednesday this part of the state had a real heavy snowfall. The storm let up late in the evening as the weather turned colder and a hard wind followed up.

Notice For Bids

Sealed bids will be received by the board of School Dist. No. 58 for 10 cords of split white poplar wood, delivered at the school grounds. Bids will be opened Saturday, Jan. 21, 1933, at 8 p.m. The board reserves the right to reject any or all bids.

Life of Ole Reierson

Ole Reierson was born in West Slidre, Valdres, Norway in 1863. He came to America when he was about eighteen years of age and settled at Hendrum, Minn. In 1891 he was united in marriage to Alette Paulseth and they moved to a farm south of Holt. They lived there for several years before settling on the farm southwest of Holt which has since been their home.

Ten children were born to them three of whom have preceded them in death, they are Esther Alma; Mrs. Peder Bjerken, and Rudolph. Those left are Mrs. Alfred Bjerken of Mahnomen; Obert of Strathcona, Oscar, Lawrence, Myrtle, Gertrude and LeRoy of Holt.

His wife died in 1916 and since that time he has taken the place of both a father and mother in caring for the younger children. Ole Reierson was a kind father and a friend to everyone both young and old, always cheerful and helpful. He was a true christian and has been a member of the Free Mission church here.

Besides the children, a brother Reier of Holt and a sister in Norway are left to mourn his passing. Also seven grand children.

Funeral services were held here on Saturday afternoon from the Free Mission church and a large crowd attended. Interment was made in the Holt cemetery.

Rev. Thev. Myhrer officiated.

Most everybody around in the community have been cutting and hauling home their summer supply of wood this week.

Game Refuge Proposed

A wild life refuge will be created in Marshall county if a bill presented in the Minnesota house Monday by Rep. F. A. Green of Stephen, is approved. It would have the state issue certificates of indebtedness to take over some 180,000 acres of land on which ditch taxes are delinquent. The plan involves about $1,000,000 in ditch bonds, of which about $100,000 fall due this year.

Farm Congress Meets

A congress of Minnesota farm organizations are being held at University Farm, St. Paul this week. The event is not known as a "congress" but that is what it amounts to. It is known as Farmers' and Homemakers' Week, when some 2,000 farmers and ond others come together to study practical problems and to hold the annual meetings of their various farm organizations.

NIZHNI NOVGOROD IS NOW "MAXIM GORKI"

Famous Russian Market Is Named for Novelist.

Washington.—After more than 700 years of fame as a great Russian market, Nizhni Novgorod recently was officially erased from the world map when the Soviet government renamed the city "Maxim Gorki," in honor of the Russian novelist, a native son.

"A city of 300,000 inhabitants, sprawling along the banks of the Oka and Volga rivers where they converge, Maxim Gorki is a husky child of water-borne commerce," says a bulletin from the Washington (D. C.) headquarters of the National Geographic society.

"Long before the city became a railroad center and telegraph wires linked it with important commercial and industrial centers of Europe and Central Asia, the inhabitants of the Volga valley and the vast agricultural and mining regions penetrated by the many Volga tributaries, recognized Nizhni Novgorod's accessibility and made it their market place.

"The city was not thrust into the world's commercial spotlight, however, until the early part of the Nineteenth century when it was made the permanent fair ground of the Volga valley fair. From ancient times merchants of the valley met to display their goods and to barter and trade. The site of the fair was frequently changed due to economic and political conditions. Nizhni Novgorod was chosen the fair ground in 1817 and, with the exception of the years from 1914 to 1922 when the World war and the Revolution interfered, the fair was held in the Volga metropolis every year until its final abandonment two years ago.

"Normally, or for ten and one-half months a year, Nizhni Novgorod was abustle with commerce, but in fair time—August 1 to September 15—it suddenly burst into even greater activity. It became a modern Babel, for merchants from many countries of the eastern hemisphere joined with the Russians in displaying their goods, wares and merchandise.

"The city's streets, hotel lobbies, railroad stations and shops echoed with the gayety of buyers and sellers and tourists of many races and tongues. The fair ground, normally a quiet, almost deserted area of stone buildings, suddenly awakened with 4,000 shops displaying an array of colorful merchandise ranging from tiny handmade trinkets to huge oriental rugs. Bulky commodities, such as iron, lumber and grain, were deposited on nearby islands. The turnover of the last few years of the fair amounted to about $100,000,000 annually. In 1927, only a few years after the fair had been reopened, more than 2,500 merchants took part.

"Recently Maxim Gorki has been called the 'Detroit of Russia' because an American automobile company has built the largest automobile plant in Europe about 15 miles up the Oka river. When the workers' town near the plant is completed the entire project will represent an outlay of more than $150,000,000. There are 23 main Detroit-like factory buildings and more than 50 different shops. A large part of the modern machinery in the plant was built in the United States.

"Although commerce has been the city's principal means of support, it early began to accumulate industrial plants. Its shipbuilding and repair yards help to supply and keep in condition many Volga boats. Nearby, in the lower part of the town, are factories where thousands of workers are employed in the production of chemicals, telephones, matches, textiles and flour.

"It is a climb of nearly 500 feet to the upper portion of Maxim Gorki, which is dominated by the Kremlin whose walls inclose one of the few remaining relics of the old Nizhni Novgorod—the Archangel cathedral, which was built in 1227. Many of the city's antiques fell before the persistent plundering of the Tatars in the Fourteenth century.

"From the Kremlin wall the traveler may get a splendid bird's-eye view of the lower town and the surrounding region. The wharves below are kept busy as Volga boats of all sizes and shapes from row boats to steamers and huge barges come and go. On the opposite bank of the Oka, which is spanned by a pontoon bridge, is the old fair ground that has lost its glamor. Beyond the far bank of the Volga stretches a village-dotted area that ultimately rises into the peaks of the Ural mountains."

Rules Ladies May Kiss Male Patients

Vienna.—Women visitors to hospitals are permitted to kiss male patients, even if these are married, a court in Vienna ruled. Paul Johannes, lying in a Viennese hospital, where he had been operated on, frequently was visited by a girl friend of his wife. His visitor, a good-looking widow of about thirty, always kissed the man when coming and leaving. His wife considered the widow's behavior to be too "charitable" and filed a suit of divorce. The court, however, did not see a default in the kisses of the young widow and dismissed the case.

Paris.—A trophy for the fastest flight around the world, whether by airplane or airship, has been offered by Prince Bibesco, president of the International Aeronautic federation here.

Under the conditions, the course to be followed must include Karachi, in India, Tokio, San Francisco, and New York, then back to the starting point, which either may be London, Paris, Berlin, Rome, or Bucharest. The prince always has been enthusiastic in encouraging long-distance flights.

The round-the-world air race will involve a flight of 22,000 miles. The trophy will be won by the first competitor who completes the trip at an average speed of at least 100 kilometers hourly. This is about 62.41 miles per hour and much slower than Post and Gatty's time.

Landings must be made at the four specified cities, but there is no other restriction. Fueling in the air may be made, so that any competitor can, if he wishes, make only four landings.

Carpenter Tries Music When Trade Fails Him

New Orleans.—John Tuin, forty-six, South Dakota carpenter, couldn't make a living at his trade, so he bought his five children band instruments and now they're "tooting" for a living on a musical barnstorming tour of the country.

The Tuins, Jennie, eighteen, who plays a cornet; John, Jr., who plays the bass horn; Margaret, twelve, who also plays a cornet; Virginia, ten, who plays a melophone; Koosje, eight, the drummer, and John, Sr. came to New Orleans in a ramshackle automobile, spotted a likely street corner, and began giving their idea of how popular jazz should be played.

The father, who leads them, said the nickels and dimes they collect have given them a comfortable living.

Irish Governor Insists He'll Speak Only Gaelic

Dublin.—The new governor general of the Irish Free State, Domnhall ua Butchalla, or Donald Buckley, does not intend to allow his staff to use the English language in his presence.

He plans to change the name of the governor general's office to the Gaelic "seanascal." Instead of residing in the vice regal lodge, he will take a modest house in the suburbs which does not contain any furniture or furnishings of British manufacture.

The governor general is the direct representative of the British crown. He was appointed by King George V upon the recommendation of President Eamon de Valera.

COUNTERFEITING INCREASES

Secret Service Reports Improved Methods.

Washington.—Counterfeiting has increased approximately 25 per cent during the last year, due to continued depression and discovery of new methods to alter and imitate currency and coins.

It was learned today that criminals are using extensively chemical processes which remove all coloring and printing on $1 bills and enable them to substitute larger figures in the corners of bank notes.

Another new development in counterfeiting is the increased production of spurious bills of small denominations rather than $10 and $20 notes. Large amounts of small imperfect coins also are appearing in widely-scattered sections of the country.

Secret-service officials said that despite this improved technique they had succeeded in checking the increase in counterfeiting which began in the summer of 1931. During the 1932 fiscal year 2,139 arrests were made, compared with 1,524 the previous year. Agents this year seized $540,538 of counterfeit currency and $49,773 of coins.

One of the chemicals used by counterfeiters reduces genuine bills to the original silk paper. They then use engravings to print currency of higher denominations. In other processes the numbers 1, 5, and 10 are removed or altered to 10, 20, 50, or 100. The words on currency are also changed, since the ink can easily be removed.

During the fiscal year 17 new issues of counterfeit currency appeared, as compared with 11 in 1932. The 17 new issues were found to have 70 variations.

Secret-service activities show that counterfeiting has spread to new sections of the country and that the service must widen its battle against currency and coin violators. Year after year counterfeiters advance in their methods of production and distribution and their movements become more veiled and difficult to check, officials said.

English Establishing Record for Sobriety

With the exception of 1918, when millions of men were at war, there were fewer cases of drunkenness than at any other time in the nation's history. They numbered only 42,300, compared with 188,900 in 1913.

Not only drunkenness, but drinking itself has declined to a marked degree in the last two decades, chiefly because of the steadily rising cost of liquor and the huge tax. In the last year, which saw the country's purchasing power sink to its lowest level, liquor sales fell off heavily.

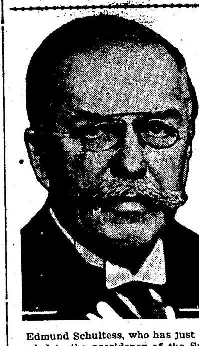
During the war drunkenness declined to the low level of 29,100 cases in 1918, but this standard was not mantained after peace was restored.

Some of the cities hit hardest by the depression shown the greatest increase in sobriety. Liverpool, for example, which had 14,894 cases of drunkenness in 1913, recorded only 2,161 last year.

Famous Old Mines Are Reopened in Wyoming

Saratoga, Wyo.—Operations have been resumed at the Alma and Meta mines in the Sierra Madre range, southwest of Saratoga, after many years' idleness. The mines were the first patented claims in the region, but had not been worked for nearly 30 years until last spring, when they were leased by O. C. Johnson, a veteran miner. A carload of ore which ran largely to lead content, but which also assayed some gold and silver, was shipped recently to a Utah smelter.

SWISS PRESIDENT



Edmund Schultess, who has just succeeded to the presidency of the Swiss confederation, held the office in 1917, 1921 and 1928. He is sixty-five years of age.

Will Has Odd Clause

Staunton, Va.—Will of the late James E. Duff provides that any heirs who use any of the funds inherited from his estate for the purchase of whisky shall forfeit all further claims to their shares in the property.

Interesting Items —of— NORTH DAKOTA

Wahpeton.—Two men, both apparently intoxicated, held up C. A. Steward of the Thompson Lumber yards and escaped with between $200 and $300.

Minot.—In the race for queen of the winter carnival to be held here, there are thirty-five girls competing. The Winter Sports Carnival is to be held from January 30 to February 5.

Williston.—While breaking contraband liquor, a quantity of beer in bottles, over an iron cask in the courthouse, a chip of glass flew in the hand of Oscar Lee, painfully injuring him.

Fairmount. — Ninety-four-year-old Mrs. Martha Ballard, in whose span of life 24 presidents of the United States were elected, was taken by death here. Mrs. Ballard was born at Level, Me.

Lidgerwood. — Lidgerwood's volunteer fire department battled flames that destroyed the Ethan Pelvit pool hall and the Mrs. O. C. Walsh bakery in the early morning hours. The loss is estimated at less than $10,000. The two buildings were frame structures and burned rapidly.

Valley City.—For a second consecutive year Valley City won the distinguished rating of first place in the state of North Dakota for activities during Fire Prevention Week, October 9 to 15, besides gaining a high place in competition with other cities of the nation.

Harvey.—Eighteen girls were taken into the Girl Scout troop No. 1 of Harvey by a formal initiation ceremony following a week of informal initiation activities. At the same time the new lieutennat, Miss Sigrid Walhowe, was introduced to the troop. Taps were sung at the close of the meeting.

Rolla.—An exhibition of ski jumping at the Disrud slide northwest of Rolla, will be held on Sunday, January 15. The slide has been improved this year, the hill cut away and made steeper for a longer and better jump.

Sanish.—The Victoria Elevator company, which last year purchased the Folven elevator, are erecting a flour mill. The carpenters will enlarge the present feed grinding addition and a $9,000 flour milling outfit will be installed. The mill is planned to be operated 24 hours daily.

Bottineau.—Cattle rustling that had been going on in the Turtle mountain foothills for several years came to an abrupt halt with the arrest of two men whom States Attorney D. J. McLennan of Rolette county said have confessed. The men arrested are Israel and Louis DesChamp of the Dunseith vicinity. They were placed in the Rolette county jail and bonds were fixed at $1,500 each and the charges of grand larceny placed against them.

Valley City.—Valley City Boy Scouts held for the first time a Pet and Hobby Show in the Barnes County Implement Co. building. The exhibition included a large variety of handicraft in woodwork, collections made by the boys during the year and numerous displays of hobbies and lastly their pets. A small charge of ten cents was charged at the door to help take care of expenses. The show was attended by a good crowd.

Tower City.—Joyce O. Roberts, a graduate of the University of North Dakota in 1921, also attending the North Dakota State college, has recently been given a Washington, D. C., assignment. Roberts, since 1926 associated with the North Dakota office of the barberry eradication project under George C. Mayoue, left for Washington, D. C., where for two months he will serve in the department of agriculture.

Fargo.—C. C. Finnegan, athletic director, and L. Saalwaechter's Bison basketball team returned from an extensive trip on which they played six games, two with Big Ten teams. The games that were victorious for the Bison were as follows: University of Iowa, "Big Ten", 21-17; James Millikan Teachers College, Decatur, Ill., 28-25; University of St. Louis, St. Louis, Mo., 23-17; North Central College, Naperville, Ill., 35-31. The games lost by the Bison were as follows: Teachers College, Carbondale, Ill., 27-34; University of Illinois, "Big Ten", 24-26.

Bismarck.—Leo Benser, 19, son of Mr. and Mrs. Louis A. Benser, Bismarck, gives thanks to his two sinewy arms that were made strong by high school football, basketball, and track teams and that he still lives today. Benser was working on the 13th story of North Dakota's new state capitol building as a carpenter's helper. A gust of wind which caught him while he was walking on a narrow beam toppled him and he started on a downward journey. At the 12th story he struck a beam, injuring his hip, and his fall was halted—long enough for him to clasp his arms around the beam in a vice-like clutch.

Fessenden.—The city fathers at their last meeting ordered all the street lights extinguished at one o'clock. The order went into effect immediately. Turning the lights off will save the city about $700 yearly according to the calculations.

Fargo.—Prominent business men, club women, and a host of other Fargoans gathered in the First Baptist church to pay their last respects to Mrs. L. B. Hanna, wife of a former North Dakota governor, and a resident of the state since 1884, whose death came after an illness of two years

On the Funny Side

ONE OF THE EARNEST ADVISERS

"You ought to be ashamed to take no interest in work," said the woman with the severe expression. "I want some wood chopped."

"Lady," replied Plodding Pete, "I do take an interest in work. I'm one of de champeen lecturers on de economic conditions an' de failure to bring de workman an' de job together."

"What good'll that do me?"

"Lady, you jes' wait an' listen to de lecture I'm goin' to give your husband fur not choppin' dat wood."

SIMPLE MATTER

Student—No particular preparation. You are, of course, perfectly familiar with the schedule price of the different operations, so you just look him up in Bradstreet's and find out how serious an operation he can stand.

Caring for Fido

"Do you mind dogs entering here?" she asked at a public institution.

"We certainly do, madam," said the official sternly.

"Then you will mind Towser, please, while I look through the rooms?"—Boston Transcript.

Not Pleased

Barber to Customer—How does the haircut suit you?

Customer—(absent-mindedly)—The hair is altogether too short. A little longer, please!—Brooklyn Eagle.

Effects of Time

"A school romance. He went to college with her."

"Is it wise for a man to marry a girl his own age?"

"She is ten years younger now."

Made Her Anxious

Richleigh—I'm getting a new siren for my car.

Tall Beauty—Oh, Alfie! Does that mean all is over between us?—Bystander.

Plenty to See

"This is a geographical film."

"No fun in that."

The Higher Art

Joe—Keep your wife supplied with candy and perhaps she won't nag you.

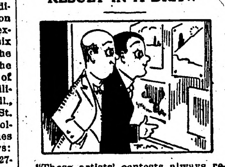
RESULT IN A DRAW



"These artists' contests always result in one way."

"How's that?"

"In a draw."

Low Fire

"Isn't it terrible how many deer hunters get fatally shot, being mistaken for deer?"

"Yes, that's why I only hunt rabbits now. If your fool companions pepper you by mistake, it is always below the knees."—Boston Transcript.

Too Bad!

Judge (rapping for order)—The defendant will please remember he is in a courtroom.

Explicit Reply

"Does your wife agree with you?" asked the lady on a visit to the tropic isle.

A Long Celebration

Mary—Isn't it dreadful? I refused to marry Archie last October and he's been drinking steadily ever since?

SELLS FINE GOWNS AT SECOND HAND

The business of selling second-hand clothing, long in disrepute, has been "glorified" by a New York woman, Mrs. Genevieve Berkeley, who is making a success of a shop where she displays only "discarded wardrobes." She calls her store "The Dressing Room," and has made a commercial as well as artistic success of the venture.

She buys her stock from wealthy New York women who do not care to be seen in the same gown at society affairs more than a few times, or from those who, having had a dress made for them, finally realize that the color is definitely unbecoming; or from actresses who feel that their wardrobe must be kept as up-to-date as the morning's newspaper, despite the resulting depletion of the bank account.

Mrs. Berkeley is fortunate in having a wide acquaintance among such women; as a matter of fact, she was an actress herself when she decided to start her novel business. She has never had any difficulty in locating clothes of the type she needs; the trouble has been, she says, to refrain from taking certain of the dresses her wealthy patrons wish her to take.

"I make it a rule," she writes in the American Magazine, "always to call personally at the homes of the people who wish me to sell their dresses and to examine each garment carefully to determine whether it is likely to have a quick turnover. If I think not, nothing will induce me to handle it."

As a result of this careful "editing" there are hanging on her racks no extreme creations that would have an appeal only to a few whose taste is especially unconventional. But there are many beautiful evening wraps, sports ensembles, gowns and coats, obviously expensive and bearing the most fashionable labels, all priced at a fraction of their original cost.

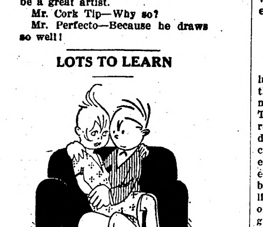
Mr. Cork Tip—Why so?

Mr. Perfecto—Because he draws so well!

LOTS TO LEARN



"You are the first girl I ever loved."

"Then you've got a lot to learn."

Two Smith college girls were members of a camping party on one occasion when the question of mushrooms came up.

"Clara," said one of them with reference to the specimens brought in, "these may be good mushrooms all right, but are you sufficiently expert in such matters to know that they are not in reality toadstools?"

"Well," said Clara, "there weren't any toads sitting on them."—Kansas City Times.

Finds Partridge Does Little Harm to Crops

The Hungarian, or European gray, partridge in the United States is not particularly harmful to crops, studies of 80 birds by the biological survey, United States Department of Agriculture, indicate.

In the fall and winter these birds feed largely on green leaves, grains of wheat, corn, oats, barley, and seeds of ragweed, foxtail grass, and bindweed. The cultivated grains seem to be picked up mostly in stubble fields, and the investigators believe this indicates no injury to growing crops.

Contents of the crops and gizzards of the birds examined showed that animal food made up 6 per cent of their food. The young birds, in particular, displayed a liking for grasshoppers, beetles, and other injurious insects.

This partridge has been introduced into numerous North American localities and has become well established in some of them, particularly in southwest Canada, Washington state, southwestern Wisconsin, southwestern Michigan, and northwestern Ohio. As it is a comparatively new bird in this country its habits are interesting to sportsmen, ornithologists, and farmers.

Ambition Gives Clew to Person's Character

If you can persuade a person to outline to you just what is his ambition in life you will have secured a good key to that person's character. Some people want to be rich. With diligence, thrift, and average intelligence, this is perhaps the easiest ambition to achieve, particularly if a little greed is mixed into the recipe. Some people want power and recognition. If they are willing to pay the price, this ambition, too, can be achieved. Here, too, greed can assist the crafty climber.

Some people want the friendship and respect of their fellow men, with as much worldly goods thrown in as is consistent with a life policy of giving everyone else the best of the bargain. Friendship and respect are the rarest treasures a man can have and the hardest to obtain.—Exchange.

Universities' Beginning

Medieval education was mostly by and for the church. In the early Twelfth century at Bologna in Italy a revived interest in Roman law attracted students, and at Salerno teachers of medicine drew pupils from many lands, while Paris became a center for theological study. A university was originally an incorporated group either of teachers to whom students resorted, or of students who hired, and fired, their professors. Popes and rulers gave privileges to these corporations, courses of study became organized, granting of degrees became common, buildings and endowments were accommodated, and by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth centuries scores of universities had been established, many of which, like Oxford and Cambridge, have had an unbroken existence ever since.

England's "White Horses"

There are three "White Horses" in England, one in Berkshire, one on the downs three miles east of Westbury in Wiltshire, and a third at Lulworth near Weymouth in Dorsetshire. On the top of the White Horse hill in Berkshire is a magnificent Roman camp, complete as if left only a few years ago, and on the downs at Westbury the earth works are as perfect as any could be found in France from the World war. As these two horses are only a few miles apart, with their camps, there seems good reason for believing the legends told of them to be founded in fact. There is no doubt that battles were fought in that section. Dorsetshire horse was cut to commemorate another event.

Danger in Grain Dust

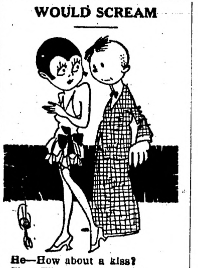
Grain dust alone is perfectly harmless, but when it is mixed with the right proportion of oxygen the mixture becomes highly explosive. Then any kind of external heat reaching the explosive point of the dust-oxygen mixture creates rapid combustion. The heat to create the explosion may be caused by static electricity developed from friction, by defective wiring, by a broken light bulb, or by the light of a match or a cigarette. When a mixture of grain dust and oxygen explodes there is no wall or roof that can stand against the terrific blast. Huge concrete blocks are hurled many yards by the force of the explosion.

Sycamore a Fig Species

The true sycamore tree, not the buttonwood which is termed the sycamore in this country, is, in fact, a member of the fig family and is quite common in Egypt. Its wood is of a particularly lasting nature and was employed by the ancient Egyptians for the manufacture of mummy cases.

The sycamore of this country has found great popularity as a shade tree and its wood, while none too strong, has found considerable use because of its beautiful grain in the manufacture of furniture and cigar boxes

WOULD SCREAM



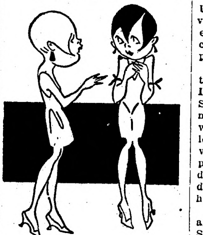
He—How about a kiss?

She—I'll scream.

He—Why?

She—For more.

BOUND TO BE



"Is Tom the marrying sort of chap?"

"Well, I intend him to be, but he doesn't know it yet."

MUSICAL FEET ALSO

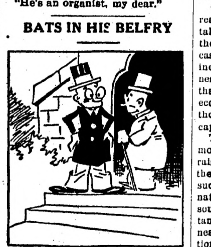
"My friend is a wonderful pianist—has such musical hands."

"And mine such musical feet as well."

"What do you mean?"

"He's an organist, my dear."

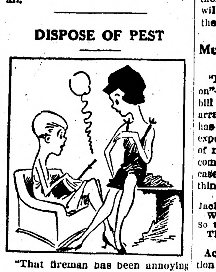
BATS IN HIS BELFRY



"The sexton says he believes his church is haunted. He hears queer noises in the steeple."

"He's got bats in his belfry, that's all."

DISPOSE OF PEST



"That fireman has been annoying me with his attentions all the evening."

"Oh, tell him to go to blazes!"

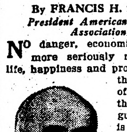
HOW DID HE DO IT?

She—I feel I have too much rouge on my lips.

He (getting busy)—That's very easily removed.

THE TAX MENACE A GROWING CRISIS

By FRANCIS H. SISSON
President American Bankers Association



F. H. SISSON

No danger, economic or social, more seriously menaces our life, happiness and prosperity than the rising tide of taxes which threaten to engulf us. This is not simply a problem of the depression. It has been developing for many years, growing more serious all the time. The depression merely brought it to a climax. Unless drastic steps are taken to reverse this trend the problem will not end with the depression. It will continue to weigh down and retard progress for an indefinite period.

In city, county, state and nation the orgy of spending has run on. It is estimated that in the United States the total cost of all government is nearly five times what it was before the World War. Many localities have been brought to the verge of bankruptcy by their expenditures, while many have saddled their citizens with a debt burden that will darken their lives and hamper their progress for years.

The total cost of Federal, state and local government in the United States is estimated at forty-six million dollars a day. Based on national income in 1930, this represents about one-fifth the total income of our people, or about $110 for every individual in the nation. Total taxes in 1931 are estimated to have taken more than 22 per cent of the national income. It is occasion for serious thought on the part of everyone when one day's income out of every four or five must be contributed to the maintenance of government machinery.

United States Government expenditures were reduced one hundred and forty million dollars during the first quarter of the current fiscal year. The recent action of bankers in calling a halt to unnecessary expenditures of New York City as prerequisite to loans will reduce the cost of government in the country's metropolis, which is second in its expenditures to only the Federal Government. No state in the Union, in fact, no other government on this hemisphere, spends half as much as this one city. These savings in Federal and municipal costs are only the beginning of a movement needed throughout the country, if we are to be led out of depression into prosperity.

Unless the people can be made to realize that money for governmental expenditure can come only from their own pockets as taxpayers, casting depressing effects on both individual effort and general business, there is an imminent threat that we may be forced to meet economic difficulties similar to those that have so seriously handicapped other countries.

The idea that money for these mounting extravagances can be raised by following the slogan "Soak the Rich" is utterly fallacious, for such a policy will simply exterminate "the rich" and eliminate sources of revenue. It is also important to realize that corporate business in this country is in no position to withstand the effects of indefinite advances in tax rates. Current earning reports reveal that fact beyond shadow of doubt. The tax base must be broadened, and it therefore seems likely that Congress will be called upon to reconsider the sales tax.

Musical Taste Matter of Matrimonial Bliss?

"If music be the food of love, play on"—but first make sure that the bill of fare has been satisfactorily arranged. Another nerve specialist has been pointing out that in his experience an "astonishing number" of marriages come to grief over incompatible musical tastes. In their case the result seems to be something like

Whereat his wife would droop—
So that with Wagner versus Jazz
They landed in the soup.

According to the specialists in question a difference of this kind can definitely lead to the divorce court—if not to serious mental disease. But up to now there are no cases of any one getting a marriage dissolved as the result of citing a Beethoven sonata as corespondent.—Manchester (England) Guardian.

No "Thoroughbred" Cattle

Purebred animals are horses, cattle, sheep, or other domesticated animals whose ancestry are known, whose parents and grandparents have been registered in the proper way in the breed records. The word thoroughbred is the name of a distinct breed of light horses which have been bred for many centuries for their speed and stamina, having come originally from the union of the Arabian and Turkish horses with the English type of horse. There cannot therefore be any such thing as thoroughbred cattle.

Reynold's New Year's Resolution

IT WAS the last night of the old year, and Reynold was going to bed. "I wish I could make some of those things Cousin Lucy and Cousin Esther were making," he said. "They are going to begin in the morning. Cousin Lucy is going to practice her music more and study arithmetic harder and keep clean."

"You mean resolutions?" asked his mother.

"Yes, that's it," said Reynold.

"Well, let us think," said his mother. "What kind of resolutions would be good for a little boy six years old to make?"

"Lucy and Esther made lots of them," said Reynold, "but they are big girls. One resolution would be enough for a little boy, wouldn't it?"

"I think it would," said his mother, "and I think that a whole year is too long a time to make resolutions for. If I were you, I would make one good resolution for one day of the New Year—the first day."

"All right," said Reynold, "I will make one for tomorrow. What would you make?"

"It is your resolution," said his mother. "You ought to make it yourself. Anything that you want to determine to do the first day of the year."

Reynold thought awhile, and then he said: "I will mind you all day tomorrow."

"Very well," said his mother; "that is your New Year's resolution; don't forget it in the morning."

Then she kissed him good-night and went out, and Reynold went to sleep. When he awoke the next morning the first thing he thought of was his New Year's resolution. He wondered if his mother had forgotten. She didn't say anything about it when he went down to breakfast. She didn't tell him to do anything, so he didn't have any chance to keep his resolution, but he never once forgot it until—who do you think came? Why, Great-aunt Prudence and Great-uncle Nathan. Great-aunt Prudence brought Reynold a pretty little willow basket full of cake—three kinds—chocolate, coconut, fruit.

Reynold liked cake better than anything else. He was delighted when his aunt said the basket of cake was for him.

Mother gave Reynold a slice of the fruit cake, then she put the basket away in the pantry. A little while after Reynold asked if he might have more cake.

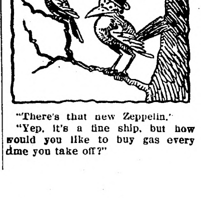
"No," said his mother; "there will be cake for dinner; you must not eat any more of your cake today."

Reynold was just about to draw his face into a frown when his mother looked at him so strangely that it made him think of his resolution. Then the funniest looking smile chased the ugly frown from his face. Mother smiled, too, and nodded and gave him three pats on the shoulder that meant "Hurrah! Hurrah! Hurrah!"—Exchange.

Family Bible Evidence Held Good by Courts

The taking of the census brings to mind a purely secular use which the Bible once enjoyed, and still does, no doubt to some extent, says a writer in Horse and Hounds, London. Entries made in the Bible by the head of the family of births, marriages and deaths were accepted as good evidence. Hence, we have the curious fact of the sacredness of a book conferring value on secular things. An instance of this was provided in the case of Hans von Huntingdon, when the right to the earldom of Huntingdon was contested. A Bible from the deceased countess of Moira contained a statement to the effect that the petitioner's uncle, or, on failure of his issue male, the petitioner's father, was the next heir to the earldom, and this was accepted as sufficient proof of various statements. Family Bibles were often, and may still be, published including spaces for family portraits and details of births, deaths, marriages, etc., and it may be that from this custom the name "family Bible" is derived.

GAS WOULD WORRY



"There's that new Zeppelin."

"Yep, it's a fine ship, but how would you like to buy gas every time you take off?"

Instant Response to Call of Human Need

Welldiggers felt queer as they dug down in excavating a new well near Vancouver, Wash. They ascended to the top.

J. A. Winston, a professional welldigger, later had himself lowered into the well. Soon he shouted for those at the surface to draw him up. Halfway up his limp hands slipped from the rope, and he fell, a victim of deadly monoxide gas.

Arthur Ames, twenty-five, volunteered to go down to bring the unconscious victim out. He attached a rope to Winston and gave the signal to be raised. He clung to the rope, and when half-way up, he, too, was overcome by the gas, which snuffed out his life.

"The whole story of the wreck," says a description of the lost Nevada, "is one of outstanding seamanship and heroism," marred only by loss of the Nevada and most of her crew. In a terrific gale boatmen from the President Madison strove to rescue. Outstanding was the deed of the radio operator, who locked himself in his room to broadcast appeals for help for the sinking Nevada, remaining at his post, and was among the lost.

There's your story of the real heart of man. In the moment of peril, when help is needed, there is always the hero—young Ames, who went down into the gas-ridden well; the radio operator, who locked his door and stayed with the ship.

In these days of crime, rackets and disrespect for law, days of bootlegging and graft, these acts of heroism stand out as a beautiful isle in a murky sea.

They prove—that which we all know—that in the general run of men and women are goodness, nobility and majesty, all ready to be brought into the light when need beckons or humanity calls.—Portland (Oregon) Journal.

Cuticura Healed

"Eczema began with small pimples breaking out on my hands. It grew worse until my hands were covered with large, wet, sore eruptions which later spread to my wrists and arms. CHAPTER XI—Continued

—14—

"I had," said Markham shortly.

"Early this morning we tried the Smiths' phone again and Mrs. Smith said that you and Miss Betty drove in between eight and nine o'clock last night. That rang the fire alarm right, and I've been haunting the hotel ever since, trying to get track of you or Mr. Landis. Have you anything at all to offer?"

"Only this: that Owen disappeared last night at about the same time; and that, a little later, I was sent to the northern part of the Timanyoni on a framed-up story which was intended to efface me for an indefinite time."

"What was the framed-up story?"

Markham told it succinctly, beginning with the telephone message which had—presumably—caused Landis to go across the street to the Little Alice offices, and bringing his own experience down to date.

"Why, that would mean that you three were the victims of some extended criminal organization," said the lawyer, half incredulously. "How could that be?"

"You've said it," Markham snapped; "If I tell you that this 'organization' has made at least two determined attempts to murder Landis and me, you will understand how serious the situation is."

"Good Lord! Who are these gangsters?"

"I wish I could tell you, but I can't. Of the four principals I can name only one; and we have nothing to involve him directly. He's a former citizen of yours whom you know very well—Herbert Canby."

Stillings frowned. "Indeed, we do know him—to our cost. Lord! I wish Starbuck were here. He's the one man in Brewster who could take this thing by the neck and choke the mysteries out of it!"

And at that moment, as if Stillings' fervent wish had evoked him, the ex-cowboy mine owner pushed his way through the revolving doors and stood before them.

CHAPTER XII

Kidnaped

Following the brief phone talk with Markham at Hillcrest Landis had cut the dinner interval short in order to return to the lobby to mark the advent of new arrivals. As the evening waned, he had strolled over to the desk to ask some questions of the clerk.

"Those three Louisville men Mr. Markham and I were inquiring about the day we arrived. Have you heard anything more from them?"

"We have. There was a wire this morning. They will be in on the Nevada Flyer this evening."

"Is that so? We understood they were driving."

The clerk smiled. "It's quite a little jaunt from Louisville to Brewster. They probably had enough of the open road after a day or so. Anyway, they are coming on the Flyer. That is what their wire said."

It was at this conjuncture that the telephone switchboard girl had come up to say, "Excuse me, Mr. Landis, but Mr. Starbuck has just called up from his office across the street to ask if you would come over a few minutes."

"Certainly," Landis had said, surprised to learn that the mine owner had returned from Copah so soon.

As he had stepped out upon the sidewalk he saw that the offices of the Little Alice Mining company were lighted, and standing in front of the bank building elevator and stairway entrance was a car with its motor running, but with its lights turned off. His first thought had been that it was Starbuck's car, but as he heard it, he had seen that it was a different make.

Since it was blocking the way, he stepped aside to pass behind it. When he was in the rear of the car, and before he could step up to the curb, the softly idling motor suddenly roared alive and the car leaped backward at him. There was time only for a futile effort to save himself, and then the street pavement rose up to smite him into oblivion.

When he came to he found himself tied and blindfolded and jammed in between two men in the back seat of a car which was being driven somewhere at reckless speed. When he stirred, the man at his left pressed something pointed against his ribs, and a grating voice at his ear said, "You've been asking for it for a good while, and now you've got it! If you make a move or raise a yell, you'll get the knife!"

Landis made no reply. Half dazed as he was, he realized that he was helpless, for the time being, at least.

As his brain cleared he took himself savagely to task for having fallen so easily into the trap set for him, and from that he strove to find answers to the questions that came thronging upon him. Who were his kidnapers? Where were they taking him, and what were they going to do to him?

These vital questions were still unanswered when the car came to a sudden stop. There were sounds as of the removing of a barricade, after which the car went forward slowly. At the next stop he was roughly hustled out. Next, he was led up a steep path or road on what seemed to be the slope of a mountain. At the summit of the ascent the forced march was continued on a level.

After the first few steps he realized that he was no longer in the open. The air was dank, and his footsteps, and those of his captors, echoed hollowly as if in a cavern. Landis counted his steps, to one hundred, two hundred, three and still more before he was halted.

There was a click of a lock and a creaking of rusty hinges. Then the man who had hold of him gave him a shove that made him stumble and fall headlong, the rusty hinges creaked again, and he was alone.

Satisfied, after a moment or two, that he was no longer in danger of being knifed, he rolled over and began to work at his knotted wrists. His fingers, trained to the manipulation of delicate mechanisms, soon got the twisted bandanna manacle untied. Then he tore the bandage from his eyes—only to find that he was still sightless; plunged in darkness almost thick enough to be felt,

Getting upon his feet, he began to explore his surroundings by the sense of touch. Cautious gropings proved that he was in an underground passage of some sort. Before he had gone very far his fingers told him that he was not in a natural cavern. The wall at his left was shattered and broken, and once his touch fell upon a smooth half groove in the stone, marking the path of a drill. This identified the passage as a drift in a mine; an abandoned mine, he assumed, since the silence was not broken by any sound of activity. Stumbling on, he found the passage beginning to ascend, and seventy-nine counted paces up the incline brought him to a place where the drift forked.

Taking the left-hand passage, he was stopped within a hundred paces by a wall of rock extending all across the passage. Turning back, he tried the right-hand drift. This led him into a maze of branchings and cross drifts in which he soon lost every vestige of the sense of direction.

Weary, and with his head still aching from the blow given him by the assaulting auto, he was about to sit down on a pile of broken stone to rest when his guiding hand on the wall came in contact with a smooth, cylindrical object wedged in a crevice. Fingertips answering for eyes, he knew at once that what he had found was a miner's candle, and with shaking hands he searched his pockets for matches. He found a familiar little card of safety matches, and the reaction from despair to hope renewed made him dizzy.

There were only seven, and with miserly care he struck one and held the flame to the candle wick.

With the candle held high he surveyed his surroundings. Two other passages came into the one in which he was standing. On every side there was ample evidence that the workings were very ancient, and that they had been long abandoned.

No longer obliged to grope in darkness, he plunged haphazard into one of the four passages and was again involved in a maze that seemed to have no end—and offered no outlet. Legweary finally, he was about to stop and rest when he heard sounds that he could compare to nothing but the sobs of a human being in distress.

Unable to determine from which of the confusing passages the sounds were coming, he found it at last by the trail-and-error method. At the foot of the steep incline down which he slid, digging his heels in and clutching for hand-holds, the flickering light of the candle revealed the figure of a woman. She was sitting on the floor of the passage with her back to the wall, and she was crying. Quickly he recognized her and ran to kneel beside her. "Betty!" he gasped. "What under heaven are you doing here? Tell me, what's happened? How did you get into this chaotic place?"

She pointed, and, following her gesture, he saw a mine bucket standing at the end of the passage, with a rope attached which disappeared upward in a chimney-like shaft.

"That is the way I came," she said, "I was lowered in that bucket from somewhere up above. I'm glad I couldn't see what they were doing with me."

"You couldn't see? Were you blindfolded, too?"

"Yes; were you?"

"I was, indeed." Then, "You're not afraid of the dark, are you?"

"No-not when I can reach out and touch somebody that I know."

"All right; I'll blow the candle out and save it. It's the only one there is." And with the return of the pitchy darkness, "Now, tell me all about it."

"You'll hardly believe me when I do, Owen. You knew that Wally and I had dinner with the Smiths at Hillcrest, didn't you?"

"Yes; Wally got me on the phone at the hotel and told me."

"Well, we left about nine o'clock or a little before, and were stopped on the way by two men who pulled Wally out of the car and tried to kidnap or murder him, I don't know which. Mr. Smith came up just in time. Then we drove on and when we reached the Stillings' the house was all dark and I remembered that Mrs. Stillings had told me, when I phoned to her from the Smiths', that she and Mr. Stillings might not be at home when I came back, and that if they weren't, and the servants had gone to bed, I'd find a latch key under the mat."

"You didn't find the key?"

"I didn't look for it. The night was so still and pleasant that I sat in one of the porch chairs to enjoy it. Wally's car hadn't been out of sight more than five minutes when another car drove up. The man who got out of it had on a white uniform and said he was one of the nurses at the railroad hospital, and that daddy had just been brought in from the fossil beds badly injured. I didn't stop to think, just flew down the walk and jumped into the car. The man got in with me.

"In just a few minutes the man clapped a bandage over my eyes and told me to keep still. Of course I knew then the story about daddy was just a made-up lie to get me away from the house and into the car. I tried to get the door open so I could jump out. It didn't do any good, and when it was over he had me tied and blindfolded and was threatening me with a pistol."

"And after that?"

"I don't think we'd been going more than fifteen minutes before the car stopped and I was made to get out and walk. In a little while I could tell we were somewhere underground. When they finally let me stop, they put me into that wooden bucket thing, untied my hands so I could hold on, and lowered me down here. What does it all mean, Owen?"

"It seems to mean that somebody, or may be a bunch of somebodies, wanted to get you and Wally and me out of the way, for some reason."

"Of course. But why?"

"You know how we—Wally and I—drove through from Carthage. There were some startling things happened on the way. We seemed to be close behind a gang of safe blowers. Since we were right behind them all the time, Wally and I began to make inquiries along the road. We soon learned that there were three men driving a few hours ahead of us, business men from Louisville, they called themselves; and from some suspicious circumstances we began to wonder if they might not be the bank wreckers.

"At a little town in Kansas Wally's car was stolen and run out in the country and smashed. We then went by train as far as Colby, where Wally bought another car. Nothing more happened until we were this side of Denver, when he found that we were just behind the three men. They were driving a Fleetwing car. Just before we reached Copah we passed a stopped car on the mountain road; and as we were running down the next loop below, a big rock came tumbling down and barely missed us."

"Mercy—how horrible!" she shuddered. "Did anything else happen?"

"Yes; we went on from Copah that night, and again the Fleetwing was ahead of us all the way across the Red desert. At a little village called Atropia, we had a flat tire; and after we had changed to the spare, we found we were out of gas. We were delayed for some time, and when we finally went on up the mountain we ran into another of the mysterious robberies. The commissary at a mine had been looted and set on fire, and two men who were guarding the safe and the payroll money were murdered. Of course, there was no evidence that the three men in the Fleetwing had done it; but we knew that their car had passed through Atropia just before we got there."

He felt her shudder as she said, "It makes cold chills run up and down my back! Is there any more of it?"

"A little more. We came on, and as we were driving down the mountain road above Lake Topaz, we saw something on fire in a deep gulch, and wondered what it could be. The next day we made inquiries in Brewster to find out if the Fleetwing had come in the night before. So far as we could learn, it hadn't.

"We spent that evening with Mr. Starbuck, and on our way back to the hotel we were set upon by three men. I was sandbagged and knocked out, but Wally beat them off and helped me to the hotel. The next day we thought we'd see if we couldn't find out what had become of the missing Fleetwing, and drove up to the place where we had seen the fire in the gulch. We left our car and climbed down to see what had burned. It was a big car, so badly wrecked that we could hardly tell what it was; but I guess it was the Fleetwing."

"Another mystery! Is that all?"

"Not quite. While we were looking at the wreck somebody began shooting at us from the road on the other side of the gulch. We ducked and climbed up through the woods to where the shots had come from. There were two men, and the shooter said they had been told there were bears in the mountains, and he'd taken us for one. There was nothing to be done about it, so we let them go."

"Can you put it all together and make the pieces fit?" she asked.

"After a fashion. Those three men we followed all the way from Indiana are the bank robbers, and they think we've got something on them. That accounts for what's been happening to Wally and me; but it leaves you out."

"Maybe," she said; but she added nothing to that single word.

"But see here," Owen went on, "we're wasting time sitting here talking about 'has-been.' This kidnaping can mean only one thing—that the scoundrels are going to pull off another of their robbing stunts and want to make sure of having a clear field. We must get out of this and block their game, whatever it may be."

"Do you know where this dungeon place is, or what it is?" she asked.

RUSSIAN FEASTS IN DAYS PRIOR TO WAR

Art of Eating Brought to High Estate.

In prewar Russia many were the fortunes spent on food and nothing but food. A good chef was more prized at times than a rare Rubens or an invaluable first edition.

At the end of the Nineteenth century, the art of eating was at its height. My father had a friend, a prince of a very old family, who had lavished three fortunes on food and, when he was completely ruined, borrowed large sums from his friends to enable him to continue the life to which he was accustomed. Fortunately for them he died a few years after he had lost his money.

This man was so fat that when he went out to dinner, he had to sit sidewise at the table, and in his own house he had had a curve cut out in the dining room table so as to permit him to face it. Once he ordered supper for twelve and forgot to invite his guests; so he sent for a neighbor to keep him company and, while the neighbor ate for one, he finished the rest of the food.

After my father was married, the prince came to visit him. My mother ordered a particularly copious nine-course dinner. There were about 25 varieties of zakuski, or hors d'oeuvres, and the prince did justice to everyone of them. He also had two or three helpings of each course.

After dinner, according to the Russian custom, the prince thanked his host and hostess, and, as he was kissing my mother's hand, she could not refrain from asking somewhat mischievously: "Have you had enough to eat, prince?" To this he replied genially: "Oh, don't worry, my dear lady; I always eat at home before going out to dinner."—Nina Nikolaevna Selivanova in Asia Magazine.

HOW TO STOP A COLD QUICK AS YOU CAUGHT IT

A New Method Doctors Everywhere Are Advising

Take 1 or 2 Bayer Aspirin Tablets.
Drink Full Glass of Water.
If throat is sore, crush and dissolve 3 Bayer Aspirin Tablets in a half glass of warm water and gargle according to directions.

Almost Instant Relief In This Way

If you have a cold—don't take chances with "cold killers" and nostrums. A cold is too dangerous to take chances on.

It is recognized as the QUICKEST, safest, surest way. For it will check an ordinary cold almost as fast as you caught it.

That is because the real BAYER Aspirin embodies certain medical qualities that strike at the base of a cold almost INSTANTLY.

You can combat nearly any cold you get simply by taking BAYER Aspirin and drinking plenty of water every 2 to 4 hours the first day and 3 or 4 times daily thereafter. If throat is sore, gargle with 3 BAYER Aspirin Tablets crushed and dissolved in a half glass of warm water, repeating every 2 or 3 hours as necessary. Sore throat eases this way in a few minutes, incredible as this may seem.

Ask your doctor about this. And when you buy, see that you get the real BAYER Aspirin Tablets. They dissolve almost instantly. And thus work almost instantly when you take them. And for a gargle, Genuine Bayer Aspirin Tablets dissolve with sufficient speed and completeness, leaving no irritating particles or grittiness. Get a box of 12 or bottle of 100 at any drugstore.

"Red Skins"

INDIANS liked red-blooded food, and they knew which foods kept them fit. History tells us that since the tomato originated in South America it is probable that it was cultivated by the Indians many centuries before the arrival of the Spaniards on that continent.

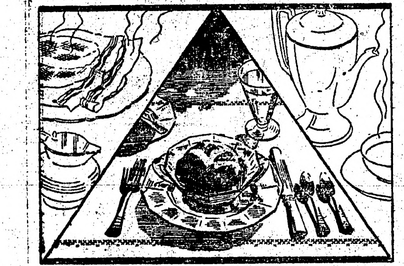
Indians no doubt broiled fresh ripe tomatoes and ate them with deer-meat and other red-blooded foods. They didn't bother about vitamins, but they did bother to know that the foods they ate made them feel good. And that's what tomatoes do for us—whether or not we realize their valuable vitamin content.

Would you like a recipe for tomatoes in a meat dish that is very savory for these nippy November days?

Tested Recipe

Ragout of Beef: Break or cut about twelve ounces of roast beef (or use a 12-ounce can of roast beef) in rather large pieces and place in six individual casseroles (or one large one). Parboil one and one-half cups of potato balls, one cup of celery and twelve small onions. Divide among the six casseroles. Cut one green pepper in one-inch squares, and add. Sprinkle with salt and pepper to taste, pour over the contents of a large can of tomatoes and bake at about 375 to 400 degrees for thirty minutes, or until the vegetables are quite tender. This serves six persons.*

Better Breakfasts



HOW shall we make them better? By better food, better table-setting and better dispositions. The latter will be inevitable. Use glassware instead of china to vary your breakfast setting. It is inexpensive, and it suggests a light, gay mood that is a splendid way to start the day. Wild-rose pink dishes on a green cloth are pretty. So is white crystal on a flowered glazed chintz cloth, or, if you like, wistaria glassware on egg-shell linen damask.

And now, gangway for the better food! Be sure that it is colorful food. Did you know that golden brown is said to be the most appetizing color for foods? Well, here is an autumn menu of golden browns, reds and golds.

Baked Apples Stuffed with Peaches
Cold Cereal
Fried Cornmeal Mush with Maple Syrup
Crisp Bacon
Coffee

Baked Apples Stuffed with Peaches: Core eight baking apples and place in a baking dish. Fill the cavities with the contents of one 8-ounce can of sliced peaches, and as much sugar as they will hold. Sprinkle one-fourth cup sugar around the apples. Dust with cinnamon and dot with three tablespoons butter. Pour around them the peach syrup and about one-half cup water. Bake for about thirty minutes, or until tender, in a 400-degree oven. This serves eight persons.*

The World in Your Market Basket

WHEN you travel in strange countries and seek the little shops along the byways for the odd and different things which are characteristic of the land in which you are wandering—you are having a most fascinating time, aren't you? Do you ever think, when you put your market basket over your arm and sally forth to the grocery that, if you are feeling in a cosmopolitan frame of mind, you may collect the good and different things from many lands, all perhaps at one store? Try it some time—it is a marvelous way to break the monotony of every day marketing.

From Arctics to Tropics

There is pineapple in golden slices, or other luscious forms, which is fairly vibrant with the sunny days of Hawaii, there is salmon—pink and firm, its flavor due to the ice-fed streams of Alaska where it swam, sardines from the little fishing villages of Norway, France and Portugal, tart grapefruit which has ripened in tropical climes; there are peppery dishes with the tang of Mexico—such as chili con carne and tasty tamales, and caviar from the shores of far-off Russia.

And coming home, with the world tucked away in your market basket, why not carry on your imaginary cruise by serving a dish that you learned from the natives, say of the Orient?

Lobster Oriental is worth going a long way to learn about. Heat two tablespoons of oil in a skillet and add one-half teaspoon of salt, a few grains of cayenne and two tablespoons of lemon juice. Slice three-fourths cup of canned bamboo shoots in very thin slices and add. Remove the tendons from a 6-ounce can of lobster, cut in large pieces and add. Sauté for about five minutes.

State of Minnesota
County of Marshall } SS.

IN PROBATE COURT

In the Matter of the Estate of Andrew L. Sagstuen, Decedent:

THE STATE OF MINNESOTA TO all persons interested in the final account and distribution of the estate of said decedent: The representative of the above named decedent, having filed in this Court his final account of the administration of the estate of said decedent, together with his petition praying for the adjustment and allowance of said final account and for the distribution of the residue of said estate to the person thereunto entitled. Therefore, YOU, and EACH OF YOU, are hereby cited and required to show cause, if any you have, before this Court at the Probate Court Rooms in the Court House in the City of Warren in the County of Marshall, State of Minnesota, on the 10th day of February, 1933, at two o'clock P. M., why said petition should not be granted.

Witness, The Honorable Bernard B. Brett, Judge of said Court, and the seal of said court this 11th day of January, 1933.

Bernard B. Brett,
SEAL Judge of Probate.
Rasmus Hage,
Warren, Minnesota,
Attorney for Petitioner.

Mr. and Mrs. Oscar L. Johnson who lost their farm home in a fire on the evening of November eight, have now gotten a newer and larger house on their farm a half mile east of town.

They recently purchased the frame house on the Martin Evenson land across the road from the Otto Johnson place. The Gronvold brothers had the job of moving it for them a week ago.

Mr. and Mrs. Johnson whom have been making their home in the house on the C. H. Gunhiem farm the past two months will move back on their own farm as soon as the weather permits.

Benzine for Beetles

To clear beetles out of cupboards and larders, sprinkle a little benzine over the boards. It will kill the eggs as well as the insects.

Holt 4-H Club Makes Big Increase In Membership

The Holt 4-H Club is getting off to a good and enthusiastic start for the 1933 season in this community with a total of about sixty boys and girls enrolled. This is an increase in membership of twenty over last year when the club maintained a membership of forty which won the American Legion Cup. This beautiful cup is on display at the Marshall County State Bank, and is a standing mark of what the local club achieved last year.

H. F. Harrison, county club leader, stated that the Holt club has set a mark for other clubs to go after the coming year.

The local club has the hearty cooperation of the business people of Holt and the prominent farmers in this community who enjoy the work of helping the youngsters get ahead with their projects and instruct them in their work so they may become the future farmers here.

Two More Old Settlers Die

Henry Wegge, pioneer farmer of this community, passed away at his farm home here on Saturday afternoon after a lingering illness of a few weeks' duration. Funeral services were conducted here yesterday from the Nazareth Lutheran church, Rev. Redal officiating. Interment was made in the Holt cemetery.

Mrs. T. O. Saastad, pioneer of this community, passed away at her home here last Thursday evening, pneumonia being the cause of death.

Funeral services were held on Monday at the Ringbo church with Rev. Tungseth of Thief River Falls officiating. Interment was made in the Ringbo church yard.

Mr. Saastad passed away a year ago.

Co-operate in 1933!

The success of the whole co-operative movement must depend on the long pull, ---not on a temporary success of the moment, but on the eventual development of a strong, loyally supported and adequately financed concern which can achieve a fair deal for the farmer all the time.

Income Tax Returns

A total of 57,539 income tax returns were made by Minnesota residents in 1930, in which was reported a total net income of $266,572,313, according to an announcement from Washington. Incomes of $1,000,000 or more for the year were reported by an army of 150 rich citizens of the United States.

20 Years Ago

Ole Saastad gave a bachelor lutefisk supper to a few of his friends. Those present were Frank Anderson, Nels Hovde, Elmer Odie, Rudolph Dahl, Cleve Bergum, Elling Tollefsrud, and Clarence Larson.

Among the homesteaders who came in for supplies that week were: Chas. Martel, Tony Anderson, Olaf Dahl, Al Huseth, Geo. Olson, Chas. Holmgreen, and J. S. Gabrielson.

A statement issued by J. A. Sorum, Sec'y, showed that the Holt creamery had 43 patrons in November, 1912, received 4,624 lbs. of cream, ave. test 27.5%. Amt. of butterfat was 1,225 lbs., for which the patrons received $404.93.

At the Winter Shows

Chief Warden Wm. F. Munch has just returned from St. Paul, where he conferred with the heads of the Game and Fish Department, relative to an exhibit at the Red River Valley Winter Shows, and stated that the exhibit will be outstanding, due to the number of live specimens included.

To be shipped from the Game Farm will be Canadian Geese, Ringneck pheasants, Golden pheasants, Black pheasants, Reeves pheasants, Hungarian partridges and quail. The Department will also display alive several different kinds of furbearing animals, together with live ducks. Two Jack Miner crow traps will also be on display, together with several types of bird self-feeders. Many mounted specimens of wild animals will be shipped up from St. Paul including an albino deer. Much space will be required, with several wardens in charge of arrangments the week before the show.

Mr. Munch states that district meeting of wardens will be held on February the 8th, which will be attended by about 25 wardens. Wm. D. Stewart, Director of the Division of Game and Fish, will attend the session and introduce Mr. Jack Minor who will give his famous illustrated licture at the Armory on the evening of February 8, at 8 p.m.

In order to accommodate the many people who wish to see and hear Jack Miner he will give the same program in the afternoon at 3:30 p. m. Mr. Miner is very fond of children, and has often made the statement, "If it were not for the children, music, flowers and birds, I would have no desire to carry on." For the afternoon meeting a special price of 10 cents for all students has been arranged by the Winter Shows management.

County Fair Dates Set

Marshall county's 27th annual fair will take place at the Fair Grounds in Warren on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, June 29, 30 and July 1, according to an announcement made today following a meeting of the Red River Valley Better Fair Circuit held in Minneapolis last week when attractions for the circuit were purchased and dates for fairs were adopted.

The Marshall county fair board was represented at the meeting by Wm. Forsberg, president; J. A. Grindeland, secretary, both of Warren, and Carl Hvidsten, director from Stephen. These men also represented the local at the Minnesota Federation of County Fairs annual meeting which was held during the same dates.

Grandstand attractions including seven special complete acts and "The Green Mill Follies Revue", the latter consisting of 32 people, were purchased by the fair officers from the Lew Rosenthal Amusement Enterprise of Waterloo, Iowa for the 1933 fair.—Warren Sheaf.

Several families here have had the flu the past week.

Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Sanoden and family, Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson and family, Rev. and Mrs. L. M. Redal and family, E. O. Nybakken, Alf. Sather, Edith Anderson, Eunice Johnson, Jeannette Lanman, and Peter Hanson were entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Gunheim Sunday evening.

Merton S. Munn Pardoned

Merton S. Munn, one of the ten oldest men serving life terms in Stillwater was pardoned recently. He was the only one of the "old gaurd" at the penitentiary to gain freedom and has served a quarter of a century behind the grey stone walls for the murder of Aug. Franklin of Spooner.

Munn was a rough rider in the Spanish-American war and had a good record. He was operating a restaurant in Spooner twenty-five years ago when he got into a quarrel with Franklin and shot him. He is now sixty years old and has saved up a nest egg of $3,450 from his earning at Stillwater and expects to move from the old soldier home where he was taken when released and, go out to the west coast to live.

More Land Set Aside

Warroad, Minn.-State and local engineer here have completed the survey of the 12 townships in Roseau and Beltrami counties that will be set aside as a forest and game tract under the name of Beltrami Island Forest. The townships within ranges 35,36,37 and 38 are totally covered by the new ruling, but as considerable of the land therein is fit for agriculture farmers will be permitted to own and operate their farms as previously. The area will be under jurisdiction of the state department of conservation which will cooperate with county authorities considering the taxation and protection of remaining settlers.

Send us the news.

HUGE PROJECTS ARE COMPLETED IN 1932

Engineers Push Conquest of Natural Forces.

Washington. — How man pushed ahead on many fronts in his conquest of natural forces during 1932 is shown in a bulletin from the National Geographic society, outlining some of the outstanding engineering achievements of the year. Despite financial difficulties, dams, bridges, tunnels and other significant works have reached completion or progressed in all parts of the world.

"Most important of the dams completed was that at Dneprostroy across the Dnieper (Dnepr) river, in the Russian Soviet union, about 150 miles north of the Black sea," says the bulletin. "Its construction was superintended by American engineers. The dam is 3,350 feet long and 146 feet high. The maximum capacity of its generators will be 900,000 horse power, which compares with the 600,000 horse power at Muscle Shoals.

"In the state of Bahia, Brazil, a huge power dam was completed and set to furnishing energy to the city of Bahia (Sao Salvador). The structure is 1,150 feet long and 131 feet high.

"Two widely separated projects on the North American continent made available large amounts of energy without the construction of dams. The first was on the United States side of the Rio Grande, near Eagle Pass, Texas, where, by gravity diversion, an 80-mile canal was supplied with water whose flow will produce electric energy before being used for irrigation. The second was the Beauharnois project, in Canada, a 15-mile power canal between Lake St. Francis and Lake St. Louis, on the south side of the St. Lawrence river near Montreal. The hydro-electric plant operated by the canal water will furnish energy to Montreal.

Colorado River Turned.

"At the site of the Hoover dam, on the Colorado river, between Arizona and Nevada, work on what will be the world's greatest dam, is more than a year ahead of schedule. For the first time, probably, in millions of years, a section of the bed of the Colorado river at the dam site is dry. On November 13 the stream was turned into a tunnel, bored in the canyon wall, and diverted for nearly a mile. On the site of the structure, thus left dry, the actual preparations are being made for laying the dam's foundation.

"In Europe, the Moselle canal, first planned 180 years ago, was completed. The 19-mile waterway is on the Moselle river, a tributary of the Rhine, in northeastern France, and connects Metz and Thionville.

"In the United States, the Illinois waterway, making possible barge service between Chicago and New Orleans, was completed.

"Africa's north-south transportation system was bettered during the year by the building of a 100-mile section of highway connecting Nimule and Juba, terminal ports on the Nile.

"Italy began work on one of the first express motor-truck roads to be built. It will connect Genoa, Milan, and Turin, tapping Italy's most important industrial district.

"In the United States five important federal government highways, opening up historic and scenic spots, were put into use: the Mount Vernon Memorial highway, from Washington to the home of George Washington; the Trail Ridge road in the Rocky mountain National park, one of the highest scenic roads in the world; the Cadillac mountain road on Mt. Desert island; a new scenic highway in Glacier National park and a scenic road along the crest of a portion of the Blue Ridge mountains in the Shenandoah National park, Virginia.

Railway Construction.

"Railways crept into new territory on five continents and in New Zealand. The longest new railway in the western hemisphere was opened in northern Argentina in August. A broad gauge line, it connects previously existing rails and affords a short cut between Tucuman and Mendoza. It is 189 miles in length.

"New railroad construction was practically at a standstill in the United States. Only 32 miles of new railway was constructed, while 1,380 miles of small branch line 'feeders' was abandoned.

"Most important rail development in the United States was the steady electrification of standard railways in suburban districts. Main line electrification was completed by one railway system between New York and Wilmington. Work is progressing between the latter city and Washington.

"The most important bridge to reach completion in the United States was the Jersey City-Newark viaduct, which is four miles long and crosses two rivers at a level to permit the passage of ocean-going ships. The structure became one of the most heavily traveled entrances to and exits from New York city. It is estimated that 20,000,000 automobiles will pass over it each year.

"Among other bridges completed in the United States were the Schuylkill river bridge at Philadelphia; the Westinghouse bridge near Pittsburgh; and the Rogue river bridge, near Gold Beach, Ore.

"The most significant land reclamation projects were carried on in the Netherlands, where the Dutch continued to rob the Zuiderzee; and in Italy, where thousands of acres of the once malaria-infested Pontine marshes, south of Rome, were drained and turned into farm lands."

One of the best basketball players on the Pacific coast is Jack Reed, the tall, lanky forward of the University of California. He is also captain of his team.

Canned Brown Bread to Take Place of Hardtack

Missoula, Mont.—Rations for Uncle Sam's forest service employees in all parts of the United States and Hawaii, packed here each year for distribution, will contain no hardtack for the coming year, officials have announced.

The "army cake," formerly used by the rangers, will be replaced by canned brown bread, increasing the calory content of the foods packed for the forest workers. The can in which the bread is packed will be used as a coffee pot after its contents have been removed, lightening the rangers' equipment. Cans of hash, pork and beans, roast beef, fruit, coffee, and a bar of candy will be placed in each rations pack with the bread.

Two-Colored 'Mum

Martinez, Calif.—A chrysanthemum of two colors, divided exactly in half, has been produced in the garden of Mrs. Raymond Johnson. The flower is half bronze color and half yellow.

Women Pick Their Greatest Leaders of Past Century

Mary Baker Eddy Heads List by 3,000 Votes.

New York.—The result of a nation-wide poll conducted for two months in an effort to ascertain whom American women consider the twelve great leaders of their sex born during the last 100 years was announced at a dinner held in the Vanderbilt hotel. Those chosen were:

Mary Baker Eddy, founder of the Christian Science church. She headed the list by more than 3,000 votes.

Jane Addams, founder of Hull house, Chicago.

Clara Barton, founder of the American Red Cross.

Susan B. Anthony, suffrage leader.

Helen Keller, deaf and blind author.

Harriet Beecher Stowe, author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Julia Ward Howe, poet and author of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic."

Carrie Chapman Catt, suffrage leader.

Mary Lyon, founder of Mount Holyoke college.

Of the votes cast Mrs. Eddy received 102,762, 3,615 more than were given to Jane Addams. Clara Barton was given 96,139 and Frances Willard 90,303.

In the accompanying list Mme. Ernestine Schumann Heink received the next largest number of votes after Mrs. Woolley. In the list were included Mrs. Herbert Hoover, the wives of two former Presidents, an author, and Anne Morrow Lindbergh.

44 Nations Reported as Off Gold Standard

Washington.—Thirty-three countries were listed by the Department of Commerce as having "officially suspended the gold standard" and the statement was made that eleven other countries, while not officially off the standard, "are practically in the same category."

The deflection of Great Britain is generally considered the prime factor in putting many other countries off and holding them off the gold standard.

The thirty-three countries officially off the gold standard were named by the Department of Commerce as follows:

Denmark, Finland, Greece, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, United Kingdom, Spain, Japan, British India, Straits Settlements, Siam, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, Mexico, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Australia, New Zealand, Egypt, Palestine, Northern Rhodesia, Southern Rhodesia, Nyassaland, Mozambique and Canada.

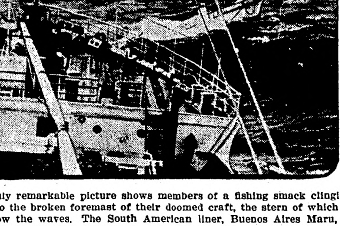
Man Abandons Farming to Pitch Horseshoes

Lamoni, Iowa.—Because he can make more money pitching horseshoes than he can farming his 160 acres, Frank Jackson, state horseshoe champ and former national titleholder, has sold his farm and stock near here.

"I can make lots more money pitching shoes than I can farming," Jackson told friends

Camera Catches a Rescue at Sea



This truly remarkable picture shows members of a fishing smack clinging frantically to the broken foremast of their doomed craft, the stern of which is already below the waves. The South American liner, Buenos Aires Maru, is pulling alongside. The fishermen were rescued just a few minutes before their vessel disappeared.

Golfer Responsible for Ball He Drives

New York.—A golfer is legally responsible when a ball he has driven injures another person, the appellate division in Brooklyn decided in upholding a Supreme court justice.

The defendant in the case was Teunis S. Fiero, who was sued on behalf of John Clifford Simpson, eleven, a caddy. While playing at the Pocatello Country club at Middletown, N. Y., last August 16, Fiero's drive struck young Simpson.

Although the point was not involved in this case, the Appellate court said in effect that if young Simpson had been Fiero's caddy it would have been his own duty to watch out for the ball, but that since he was caddying for another player, Fiero was responsible.

Letter Lies in Pocket 16 Years, Then Is Sent

Harlingen, Texas.—A letter written 16 years ago by a Harlingen boy to a friend in Maine has reached its destination, but the mail service was not responsible for the delay.

The letter was found by Rev. Francis M. Sander in a coat given to a Harlingen welfare organization. He mailed it to Roy Stanhope, the addressee, and it reached him though he had moved from Calais, Maine, to Lowell, Mass.

North Falmouth, Mass. — While clearing his cornfield of stubble, Anthony Ferreira unearthed a wallet which he lost two years before. Sixteen dollars that the wallet contained were intact, though mud caked. Ferreira exchanged the bills for new ones.

The Fable of the Feeble Squawk

By GEORGE ADE

(©, Bell Syndicate.)—WNU Service.

ONCE there was a Parent who was so heated under the Neck-Band that he laid back his Ears and lifted his Bristles and vowed that he wouldn't stand for any more Rough Comedy. He had been the Angora long enough. Papa was fed up. Old Reliable was ready to put on his War Paint and Feathers and lift a few Scalps.

Of course, you have guessed the Plot. It deals with the Younger Generation. Once it was known as the Rising Generation, but that was before it Rose to such an Eminence of Cussedness that it hit all of the High-Spots and could not be expected to establish any more Altitude Records without completely blowing the Lid off.

All of us know that any old-fashioned Dad who hops into the Arena and engages in a Battle with a handsome and well-groomed Hound about 10 years old or a night-blooming Deb is licked before the Gong sounds. The Old Folks have not a single Decision in the Western Hemisphere during the last Five Years. Every time a Verbal Champion goes against a bewildered Has-Been, the result is a Foregone Conclusion.

Notwithstanding which, Mr. Grivets, still nursing the Delusion that there was such a Thing left in the world as Parental Authority, got Wallie and Edna up on the Carpet and proceeded to lay down the Law.

Barking Words That Don't Bite.

He tried to win his Argument by making a lot of Noise. This is Faded Material. The more he vociferated the more helpless he felt, in the Presence of the titled Nose and the scornful Eye-Brow. He started out as Caesar and finished up as a mere Splutter.

He pulled a lot of new Regulations on the Offspring. For instance:

No More Late Hours.

No More Using the Car Without Permission.

No More Charge Accounts.

No more Attacks on the Ice Box at 4 A. M.

No more inviting up to the House those Jovial Acquaintances who look as if they were wanted by the Police.

No more Breakfasts served at 1 P. M.

In brief, the Program which Mr. Grivets outlined with scathing Diction contemplated a Return to Sanity, Sobriety and Simple Living, with an incidental Endorsement of the Coolidge Doctrines of Economy.

After he had just about talked himself hoarse without getting any Results except a few pained Looks, Edna took a long Pull at her Cork Tip, and said: "Well, Pop, you are barking very well this Morning, but you haven't spilled anything except a Lot of Words. You must have been brought up back of a Barn or Some Place like that. I never saw such a Doodle Heck. The Jaws keep moving and it sounds like somebody saying Something, but the Whole Thing is just Gooseberry Marmalade. As an Orator you are a total Bust. Just a Wibble, that's all. I advise you to wash up and get off the Lot."

Hot Zizzer Obtains New Coat.

"And if this Pickle Juice you are serving is meant for your perfectly wonderful Son, you can deliver my Share of it to some Poor Family, spoke up Walter. "What a Fibgrottle you turned out to be! Standing there, right on top of a Rug, and trying to tell me how to loosen a Parachute and make a Jump. Boy, I've got Medals and Speed Records that you never even read about. You're just a Man that lives up at our House. You're what we have to explain to our Friends. You are just the Scale on our Family Tree. We have a right to be annoyed by you, but were not because you are the unfortunate Victim of Flannel Pajamas and too much Cereal Food. You have the Boobitis, which means that there is no Circulation above the Adam's Apple."

"For the first time in the History of the World, the Grivets Family is making the First Page," suggested Edna. "Wallie and I are putting it over, in spite of you and the other Handicaps. We are crashing into Swell Dumps where You and Ma couldn't break in with a Jimmy. We are a couple of hot little Zizzers and you ought to be rooting for us instead of trying to check in before Midnight. Why, the Bambinos we travel with don't get their Eyes wide open until about 11 P. M."

"What's more," chimed in Wallie, "this loud yelp about using that broken-down Taxi is just a Giggle. If you wasn't such an Oof, you wouldn't expect two Headliners to travel around in an old 1931 Model. Why don't you come out of your Doze and buy each one of us a Racer—something Snappy with real Lines to it?"

"You want something that goes with a Raccoon Coat," suggested Father, trying to be Sarcastic.

"The Raccoon Coat is about six weeks out of Date," replied Son, with a weary shake of the Head, suggesting that Dad was an incurable Yap. "I have just ordered one made of Manchurian Spotted Fox. It will make all the other Laddies burst into Tears and I am getting it for Four Hundred Bucks."

"Europe will have all of the War Debts paid before you earn that much Money," said Mr. Grivets. "You talk about Four Hundred Dollars as if it were Something to be picked off a Bush. If you don't mind, I should like to have you two Birds of Paradise remember that I do not get my Money at a Pump. I am just an old Frazzle, brought up under the Prehistoric Conditions of the Mid-Victorian Era, but if I didn't get out and rustle a new Bank Account every week, you would starve to Death before Spring. Having attended all of the Movies, read all of the Books, and seen all of the Plays, you are now making a Frantic Attempt to make all of the other Sheiks and Shebas look like Second-Raters from Pokeville. The only reason I am so interested in your Criminal Ambitions is that I am supposed to finance all your delightful little Expeditions into the Underworld. Sometimes I wonder what the Finish will be. Probably your Mother and I won't live to see it."

Fooling the Slickers.

"Oh, many Pishes and a couple of Tushes!" exclaimed Edna. "Any poor Gillie who expects his Daughter to braid her Hair down the Back and play the Cottage Organ in these hoop-la Days, doesn't deserve to have One. What would you rheumatic Relics do these Days if you didn't have the Young People to talk about? And did you ever stop to think that if we stayed home Evenings and played Authors, Crokinole, Jack Straws, and Tiddledy-Winks, all the Saxophone Players would be out of Work, and there would be a lot of Suffering?

"We are the busy little Life-Savers of this transitional Period. If it wasn't for us, the Earth would have a Crust on it. A lot of you doddering Dummies who are sticking around after your licenses have expired ought to be tickled to Death to pay the Expenses. We are giving you real Entertainment, but the Trouble is you are not keyed up to it. It is too bad that we find in our Cities so many small-town Rubes who got in by mistake. We'd love to take you and Ma with us if you could keep up and maintain the Pace and exhibit some Class, but its no use trying to show you any Touches of High Life, because neither one of you is gaited to be a Stepper."

"The Situation is clearing up somewhat," said Mr. Grivets. "I can begin to see that your Mother and I are wholly to blame. Either that, or we should have sent both of you to the Reform School about Ten Years ago."

"You old Wickies and Diladads make me plumb tired," said Wallie. "Whenever several of our typical Parents get together these Days, they sit in a Back Room licking up Scotch guaranteed to be a Week or Ten Days' old, and worrying for fear that the Young People are not getting a good Quality of Gin. Those who haven't Fallen Arches still try to Dance and most of those not running for Office seem to be making a Joke of some Good Law. And yet they are always roasting us Kids. You are a lot of Jabbernowls."

"What's a Jabbernowl?"

"I don't know. I'm simply trying to protect the Author. He writes his Stuff at least a Month before it is printed, and of course, any Juvenile Slang that he put in would be out of date, cold and discredited before the Time of Publication. So the only Safe Plan is to coin a few Words which mean Nothing and put them in and then the Slickers may think that he has dug up some New Ones which they have not heard."

This unexpected Reply put Father on the Ropes. By the time he recovered, the two Moderns had picked his Pockets, cranked up the Bus, and started for a Nice Place known as The Purple Bulldog.

King's Verger to Retire; Has Served Sixty Years

John Crisp, the verger at Sandringham church, is retiring on a pension granted by the king after 60 years of service with royalty.

He has shown probably nearly half a million people from all parts over the beautiful church, with its solid silver altar table and pulpit, precious stones, and memorial windows and plaques of past members of the royal family.

For 44 years he has held the position, and was known to nearly all the crowned heads of the world.

Before becoming verger Mr. Crisp was an attendant at the skittle alleys at Sandringham house, where kings and emperors used to play. He remarked in connection with that work: "I have picked up the pins (skittles) for nearly all the monarchs of fifty to sixty years."

He is seventy-three years of age, and probably the oldest employee of the king, who is now pensioning off his workers at sixty-five.

Mr. Crisp is rather sad at retiring, and feels the wrench after so many years' service. He will also receive the national pension and the many advantages the king so generously gives to his pensioners.—Montreal Herald.

"It's an abandoned mine; abandoned a long time ago, at that. As to where it belongs on the map, I don't know. You won't be afraid to stay alone for a few minutes, will you? I'm going to climb up and see where this bucket leads to. Just stay where you are until you hear me lift the bucket and drop it. Then climb in and shake the rope when you are ready for me to haul you up. Will you do that?"

"Yes," she agreed; and with that he laid hold of the rope and began to climb up.

When he had wriggled out at the top of the shaft and found, by groping around, that it was capped with a wooden windlass, he was willing to rest for a few seconds and catch his breath before giving Betty the agreed-upon signal.

At once it was answered and he began to wind. In a few minutes he had drawn the bucket and its precious freight out upon the windlass platform.

When the candle was relighted it became apparent that they had ascended to what seemed to be nothing more than an upper layer of the rabbit warren of bewildering passages and drifts.

"Haven't you any idea where we are?" Betty asked.

"Wait a bit," said Landis; and then, "I've got it! Hasn't Bert Canby told you about his mine—the Quavapai?"

"Yes."

"Well, there are two Quavapais; the new one that is being worked now, and a much older one," and he repeated for her Starbuck's account of the ancient workings. "That is about where we are," he concluded; "buried somewhere in those old workings. We'll keep on going while the candle lasts. There must be some connection between these old workings and the new. You're not too tired to tramp, are you?"

"I'm not tired at all, now. And we must get out if we can. We haven't been kidnaped and shut up in here for nothing."

That was the beginning of a long period of fruitless wanderings in a maze that seemed endless.

It was not until their candle had dwindled to a half-inch that the really desperate character of their situation gripped Landis. With the light gone they would be utterly helpless.

"We are nearly at the end of things, Betty," he said soberly. "You see how much there is left of the candle. After it is gone we'll be just buried alive."

"I know; but I'm not afraid, Owen. It—it will be starvation, won't it? I don't want to die, but I'm not afraid. Let's sit here on this pile of rock and face it the best we can."

For a little while they sat in silence. When he spoke it was to say, "I'm to blame for whatever happens to you, Betty. If I hadn't brought you along—the devils, whoever they are, who kidnaped you, wouldn't have left you to starve at the bottom of that shaft."

"Maybe not. But you mustn't think of that now. You did what you thought was best; we both did. Do you think they've got Wally, too?"

"Im afraid they have."

"If he is gone, there is nobody to miss us; not very soon, anyhow. The Stillings will think I was invited to stay overnight with the Smiths; and the people at the hotel won't miss you, will they?"

"No, I suppose not."

As he spoke, the remaining bit of candle wick fell over, to burn flickeringly for a few seconds before it went out.

After a moment in the Stygian darkness that followed the extinguishing of the candle, Betty said wearily, "I'm awfully tired; aren't you, Owen?"

"No; not very tired. But I know you must be. Put your head on my shoulder and go to sleep, if you can."

She did it, and after a little while he knew from her regular breathing that she had really fallen asleep. Before long he felt that he, too, was succumbing; and after a few efforts to fight off the lethargy of fatigue, his eyes closed in spite of his resolve, and he slept.

When he awoke Betty was still sleeping, with her head on his shoulder, and, sharp as was his desire to move and stretch and get the stiffness out of his muscles, he was unwilling to disturb her.

It was while he was sitting with wide-open eyes staring into the darkness that he saw, or thought he saw, a faint thinning of the darkness at a point directly opposite. He stared again and saw nothing. Then, in a flash, the faint thinning of the blackness came again, and his start at this repetition of the phenomenon awoke Betty.

"What is it?" she asked.

"I don't know. Look straight ahead; do you see anything?"

"Why—why, yes; it's light! Is someone coming for us?"

He rose stiffly and lifted her to her feet. "We'll see," he said, but he did not say it hopefully.

What they saw, when they crossed to the mouth of one of the passages leading out of the space where they had slept, was a thing that Landis was not remotely expecting to see. The passage mouth was the entrance to a long, gently inclined tunnel, at the lower extremity of which was a faintly glowing electric light.

"What does that mean?" Betty asked, whispering as if she were afraid the miraculous light might disappear if she spoke above her breath.

"It means that my guess was right. We've been lost in the old workings of the Quavapai, and that light is in one of the new workings!"

"Now that we know where we are, we can get out, can't we?"

"We can try mighty hard, anyway. We'll go down and see what's at the bottom of this rathole."

Approaching the lower end of the inclined passage, they could see that the light bulb was suspended from the roof of a much larger drift, through which ran a miniature railroad track. Landis asked Betty to stay behind in concealment while he went on to investigate. She consented, merely urging him to be careful.

"Don't worry about me; I'll hurry back after I find out whereabouts we are, and the way out."

Reaching the larger tunnel he found it empty. Though the working tunnel was lighted, it was driven on a curve which limited the view in either direction.

Since there was nothing to determine a choice, Landis turned to the left. Before he had gone very far he heard the rumble of a car on the rails behind him and hastily crowded himself into a niche in the tunnel wall. When the car came in sight he saw that it was pushed by a single man. A slight upgrade in the drift made the man put his head down and brace to his work, so he saw nothing as he passed Landis' hiding place.

Watching the car, Landis had a curious shock when, just before it disappeared, the squeaky rumbling of the wheels stopped abruptly. The car moved as silently as if the wheels and the rails upon which they were running were shod with velvet.

Convinced instantly that there could be but one reason for the sudden silence, Landis crept forward. The tunnel straightened itself and the scene he was more than half expecting to see was revealed.

In the tunnel heading a number of men were at work; two of them manipulating two big air drills which were visibly churning away at the rock face of the heading. But instead of the raucous clamor which this should have raised there was a silence as profound as that of the grave!

Fully aware now of the use to which his stolen invention was being put, Landis made a quick search for the hiding place of the black box. He had little difficulty in discovering it. It was half concealed in a shelf-like niche of the tunnel wall close at hand, the electric current for its operation being taken from the light wires overhead.

Landis saw that his time for action was short. In a few minutes, or perhaps seconds, the car would be coming out. Reaching up quickly, he opened a slide in the black box and did that which was needful to paralyze its delicate and intricate mechanism. Then, as the deafening, ear-splitting clamor of the chattering drills burst out in the heading, he leaped for a branching side drift.

The effect of the suddenly released din upon the men in the heading was astonishing. They had evidently become so well used to the abnormal conditions that the sudden resumption of the natural order of things precipitated a wild panic. While two of the men hastened to shut off the air pressure from the drills, the remainder came stumbling out, some with their fingers in their ears, and so on out of the picture.

A moment later the two who had run to stop the drills came along, but they were not hurrying. When they came under the nearest light bulb Landis recognized them at once as two of the three he and Markham had seen in the lobby at the Copah hotel, two of the trio who had driven westward from Copah to disappear so unaccountably and mysteriously.

"What the h—l do you suppose went wrong with the machine?" one was saying as they passed.

"It got me for a second," said the other. "I wasn't looking for it. Think it gave the snap away?"

"If it did, there'll be merry h—l to pay. The captain 'll want to kill somebody. Today is the day when the big deal is to be pulled off."

This was all that Landis heard; and when he looked out he saw that they had taken the black box from its niche and were trying to make it function. Presently one said, "It's no good; she's gone out blink; burnt herself up inside somehow, I guess." Then Landis saw him open the slide in the side of the box and direct the beam of a pocket flash into the interior; saw him do this and heard his low whistle punctuated by the single word, "H—l!"

"What for?" queried his companion.

"Smashed all to the devil," said the investigator, replacing the box on its shelf.

"Say! Didn't the captain give orders that one of us was to keep a strict watch on that box every minute of the day or night it was in here? And that isn't the worst of it. Do you know who smashed it? If you don't, I do, d—d well! It was the fellow who made it—the fellow we locked up in the old Indian mine last night!"

"You're crazy. That chute is a good two miles from the place where we locked that fellow up; and, allowing that he had a light—which he didn't—he'd get lost a million times before he could find the way over here."

"I don't care. He's the only—"

There were two empty dynamite boxes lying beside the railroad track, and Landis, looking on and listening in his covert, saw one of the men suddenly push the speaker to a seat on one of them, planting himself quickly on the other, and saying as he did so, "Cut out the chin music! Here comes the captain with his goldfishes! We want to let him find us keeping watch on that box!"

Landis craned his neck to enable him to see farther down the tunnel. A group of four men was approaching, the one in the lead carrying a flashlight. As the four passed he saw that the light carrier was Canby; but the three men who were picking their way in Canby's wake were strangers.

As the four came up, Canby stopped and spoke to one of the workmen.

"Air quit on you, did it, Jim? It's all right, I was just about to send in to tell you to knock off a bit until I could bring these gentlemen in and show them what we've got."

Landis reasoned instantly that this was said for the benefit of the three strangers. Canby must have learned from the panic-stricken miners the true cause for the stoppage.

"Of course, you can't tell much about a gold mine by merely looking at it," Landis heard the speaker say to the three as they stood in the heading. "The assays tell the true story of the values, and, as you know, we have given your examiners a free rein."

"You have done everything you agreed to," said one of the three. "There is only one thing that puzzles us a bit; and that is, why you are willing to let go of so good a thing as this mine seems to be."

Canby laughed easily.

"I can give you the reason in four words, Mr. Fleming; I'm no mining man. A year ago I thought I was, and I let a bunch of scamps stick me for the old Quavapai. I found out pretty soon that I'd been 'done', but the extent of the old workings was sufficient proof that the mine had once been a producer. So I sent some good money after the bad, developing one of the old veins. Here is the result; but, good as it is, it hasn't made a mining man out of me, my interests now are all in the East, and I can't ride two horses at once."

There was more talk. After a time one of the three said, "Well, I guess we have seen all we need to, and I think we are pretty well satisfied. I guess we may as well adjourn to Brewster and have our lawyers draw up the papers. What do you say, Fleming, and you, Cantrell?"

There was no dissenting voice, and a moment later the group of four was passing the mouth of the shallow drift on its way out.

For perhaps five minutes after the sound of the footsteps of the retreating quartette had died away in the distant reaches of the tunnel, the two men who were barring the way for Landis made no move, and his impatience to get back to Betty became a maddening obsession. Then one got upon his feet and began where he had left off when the interruption had come.

"I'm telling you that the fellow we locked up—the fellow that made that back-action loud-speaker over there—is the one that turned h—l loose on us a little while ago, and I'll make a ten-to-one bet he's hiding in that old chute right now. Let's go back and get him."

Then to Landis came the thought of what they would find in the inclined chute—Betty, waiting bewildered and dismayed. His groping hand reached backward and fell upon a miner's shovel, and with only this for a weapon he leaped up and darted out Berserk-mad, to fall upon the retreating pair.

Fortunately for him the two men had their backs turned when he made his silent charge upon them, and before they heard him he had hit one a smashing blow over the head with his shovel, knocking him across the rails of the mine track. But before he could swing the shovel a second time, the other man had whirled, drawn his Colt and fired. It was merely a lucky chance that the heavy bullet struck the shovel blade and glanced aside to flatten harmlessly against the tunnel wall, but the chance sufficed. Before he could squeeze the trigger again, Landis was upon him, flailing at him with the shovel, mad with the madness that makes the fighting maniac invincible.

Driven back by the furious attack, the man tried to cover his face. A chopping blow of the shovel made him drop his pistol. At this he sought to close with the maniac, but Landis lowered his clumsy weapon from cutting to thrusting and the sharp blade of the digging tool caught the charging enemy just above the belt. He gave a grunt and bent double over the thrusting shovel, but in falling he got his hands upon his lighter antagonist and dragged him down.

Dropping the shovel, Landis tore fiercely at the gripping hands. Like grim death his opponent held on, struggling desperately for the breath the savage stomach thrust had deprived him of. It came at last, and when it did, Landis knew that the fight was lost; the man had him down, while he groped with the other hand for the dropped pistol.

Splinter Is Found in Man's Abdomen

Oceanside, Calif.—A strange discovery was made when doctors performed a major operation on C. W. Reche of Fallbrook, near here. Reche fell from a ladder while picking fruit on his ranch several years ago. A splinter of wood which evidently penetrated his abdomen at that time was not known until an incision was made for the operation. Reche is not one of the large beefy persons, who might carry a sliver about with them and not be cognizant. He is particularly lean. He is keeping the splinter as a souvenir.

LAD SAVED AFTER 5 MONTHS ON ISLAND

Clarksburg, W. Va.—Russell J. Phillips, twenty-one, Buckhannon student, has been rescued after being marooned five months and facing death from exposure or starvation on Chirikoff island, a lonely spot of sea-bound earth off the Alaskan coast.

The welcome news was received by Russell's worried father, Claude E. Phillips, of North Buckhannon, who had not heard from the son in nearly seven months.

Russell left Buckhannon last February to hunt gold. With a mining party he landed on Chirikoff island, April 27. While other members of the party left June 16, Phillips and a friend, Edward C. Barker, nineteen, remained behind to be picked up by a trading vessel which was scheduled to call at the island a little later. The trading ship came for them, but was unable to land at the island, Phillips told his father. The island has no harbor and cannot be approached in rough weather. At the time the young men did not know the ship had come and they waited for it in vain.

Their provisions got lower and finally were all consumed. They became hungrier and weaker, but managed to exist by occasionally killing wild game. They got terribly lonely. They had a violin and ukulele, but the strings were soon broke. They even fought to pass away the time.

One evening recently they saw a vessel two miles off shore. They signaled with a pocket flashlight and got an answering flash from the ship. The next morning three fishermen from the Pacific landed in a small dory and took the castaways on board. On arrival at Seattle, Phillips immediately got in communication with his father.

The terrible experience has not dampened the spirits of the youthful gold seeker, however. "I'm going back," he told his father. "And we're going to get gold."

Electric Chair Myth Is Exploded at Ohio Prison

Columbus, Ohio.—The Frankenstein story of the inventor of the electric chair being the first person to be electrocuted has gone down with other romantic myths.

An obscure cabinet maker named Harry Glick invented the chair. Glick, a fourth termer, serving life for first-degree murder, died of heart disease behind the walls of Ohio penitentiary.

Charles Justice, whose name lent color to the death in his own device myth, had been credited with inventing the chair. Justice was electrocuted October 27, 1911, after being sent to the penitentiary for the murder of John Shoup. He was a Greene county man.

"Intemperate in his habits," "had no friends" say pages of the prison record under the name of Glick. It was from the records of the two men that the falsity of the electric chair story was determined. Justice was not yet in the penitentiary during the years when the chair was made.

Glick, a clever man with tools, set to work on the instrument of execution shortly after a hanging at the prison, April 29, 1896. It was the last Ohio penitentiary hanging. The chair remains essentially the same as the first one made by the prison cabinet maker.

Wolf Playing 'Possum Surprises Indian Guide

Isle Royale, Mich.—Adam Roach, a young Indian guide of Chippewa harbor, learned to his sorrow that a wolf that appears to be dead may be only playing possum.

On a visit to one of their traps near Siskiwit lake, Adam and Holger Johnson found a big wolf in the trap. The usual procedure of clubbing the animal was followed and the wolf appeared to be as dead as the proverbial door nail. But when Adam was getting ready to shoulder the animal in preparation for the long trek homeward it suddenly came to life and bit a piece out of his hand.

Boy Criminals Ordered by Judge to Read Books

Along with jail terms, Judge Miles sentenced first offenders to a course in classified reading. Recently he quoted a passage from Keats, and told two boy bandits to find it and report to the probation department.

Forget the Petty Troubles of Life

Some one has observed that our lives are cut into small pieces; work, play, love, friendship, social contacts, business, responsibilities, financial and blood relationships; and all the little pieces are colored by our temperament, our training, our inbred likes and dislikes, habits, tastes and yearnings: the essential business of living is to fit those pieces into a picture.

The petty annoyances of daily life are harder to bear than the real burdens to which we seem to adjust our shoulders. We grow tired of listening to a radio which echoes only the "hare-brained chatter of irresponsible frivolity" when there are so many beautiful things to which we might listen—if permitted. It requires the patience of Job to rise above the persistent clatter of unwelcome sounds. But we must try to remember that what is important to one may be trivial to another, and adjust ourselves accordingly. We might be poetical and steal new hopes with every dawn and make a rose-jar when they die.

"He has achieved success," says a philosopher, "who has lived well, laughed often and loved much; who has gained the respect of intelligent men and the love of little children; who has filled his niche and accomplished his task; who has left the world better than he found it, whether by an improved poppy, a perfect poem, or a rescued soul; who has never lacked appreciation of earth's beauty, or failed to express it; who has looked for the best in others and who has given the best he had; whose life is an inspiration and whose memory a benediction."—Exchange.

NOW! EASE A SORE THROAT INSTANTLY

Feel Rawness, Irritation, Go At Once

These Pictures Tell You What To Do

GARGLE Thoroughly—Throw Your Head Way Back, Allowing a Little to Trickle Down Your Throat.

Remember Only Medicine Helps A Sore Throat

Modern medical science now throws an entirely new light on sore throat. A way that eases the pain, rawness and irritation in as little as two or three minutes.

Results are among the most extraordinary in medical science. On doctors' advice, millions are following this way . . . discarding old-time "washes" and "antiseptics." For it has been found that only medicine can help a sore throat.

Simple To Do. All you do is crush and dissolve three BAYER Aspirin Tablets in half a glass of water. Gargle with it twice—as pictured above. If you have any indication of a cold—before gargling take 2 Bayer Aspirin Tablets with a full glass of water. This is to combat any signs of cold that have gone into your system. Keep on taking if cold has a "hold." For Genuine Bayer Aspirin will not harm you. Your doctor will tell you, it does not depress the heart. Get a box of 12 or a bottle of 100 at any drug store.

Reduces Infection, Eases Pain Instantly. Gargling with Bayer Aspirin will do three things: Relieve soreness at once. Allay inflammation. AND—reduce infection; which is the important thing in fighting a sore throat.

It requires medicine—like BAYER ASPIRIN—to do these things! That is why throat specialists throughout America are prescribing this BAYER gargle in place of old-time ways. Results are quick and amazing.

Be careful, however, that you get real BAYER Aspirin Tablets for this purpose. For they dissolve completely enough to gargle without leaving irritating particles. Watch this when you buy.

A $1 Dinner for 4

DIVIDE one dollar among four persons quickly, class, and what have you? Not much, if you were to take it to a restaurant to buy a dinner. Now scan the menu below and see what you have for twenty-five cents per person.

Deviled Cheese Fondue 34¢
Buttered Broccoli 30¢
Tangerine and Cabbage Salad 12¢
Bread and Butter 6¢
Apricot Pie 15¢
Demi-tasse 3¢

Deviled Cheese Fondue: Spread the contents of one 1¼-ounce can of deviled ham evenly over three thick slices of bread and cut in cubes. Put alternate layers of the bread cubes and one-fourth cup of grated cheese in a buttered baking dish, seasoning each layer with salt and pepper. Beat two eggs thoroughly, and two-thirds cup milk, and pour over. Dot with butter and bake in a slow oven for about twenty to twenty-five minutes or until firm and until the bread is slightly brown on top.

Apricot Pie: Cook one-half of the contents of a No. 2½ can of apricots in their syrup with one-third cup sugar for two or three minutes. Add one tablespoon flour which has been smoothed with one tablespoon water, and cook for a few minutes longer. Line with pastry a small pie tin (the size to serve four), pour in the apricot filling, and cover the top with narrow strips of pastry, arranged crisscross. Bake in a hot oven for about twenty minutes.*

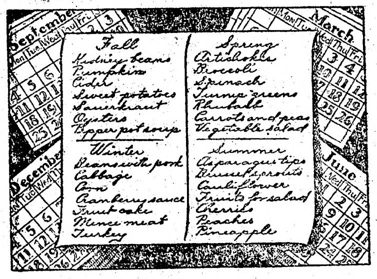
EARLY spring months are temperamental. So are appetites. There is a spirit of change in the air, and we crave a change of food. Good old bacon and eggs have perhaps been all we could wish for a month or so ago, but just now we want fruits nobody ever heard of and a pièce de résistance that is utterly out of the ordinary.

Try combining fruits to get a different fruit flavor. Try also some waffles that are light as a feather and yet sufficiently sustaining to be useful. Try the interesting menu suggested here.

Rice Waffles: Beat two egg yolks until thick and lemon colored. Add one cup of diluted evaporated milk. Combine with the following sifted dry ingredients: one cup flour, three teaspoons baking powder, one tablespoon sugar and one-fourth teaspoon salt. Beat until smooth. Add three-fourths cup of cold boiled rice and three tablespoons of melted butter; fold in two stiffly-beaten egg whites. Bake on a hot waffle iron like any waffle. This makes four large waffles.*



The Food Calendar

THE calendar does much to keep life from becoming monotonous. Whether or no, we must change our bathing suits for fur coats and our golf sticks for skis. Once upon a time we had to change our foods, whether or no—until canned foods came along and gave us our favorite strawberries in winter and oysters in summer.

All the same, it is just as well to have a food calendar and jot down, from the long list of food in cans, those that especially appeal for each season. Here are some suggestions.

Add Yours to These

Winter: Beans with pork, cabbage, whole kernel corn, hominy, cranberry sauce, figs, prunes, mackerel, oysters, chili con carne, fruit cake, mincemeat, popcorn, fig pudding, plum pudding, spaghetti with tomato sauce, corned beef, beef stew, whole ham, Boston brown bread, turkey, mulligatawny soup, okra soup, vermicelli, Irish stew, sausages with sauerkraut.

Spring: Artichokes, broccoli, carrots and peas, mushrooms, spinach, turnip greens, vegetable salad, rhubarb, shrimps, lobster, clam cakes, creamed white potatoes, sliced bacon, deviled chicken, tongue, veal roast; creamed chicken soup, pea soup.

Summer: Asparagus tips, Brussels sprouts, cauliflower, mustard greens, fruits for salad, berries, cherries, peaches, pineapple, clams, shad roe, crab meat, grapefruit juice, whole chicken, veal loaf, chicken broth, purée of celery soup.

Rice Planted In Lakes

Continuing its policy of restoring wild life in Minnesota, the State Game and Fish Department has planted 15,000 pounds of wild rice in Thief Lake and Mud Lake it was announced recently in a report sent out by W. D. Stewart, State Game and Fish Commissioner. The rice not only will enhance the natural beauty of the two lakes; but will provide feed for our Minnesota ducks. He said the rice was purchased from the Indians at Ball Club on the Mississippi River south of Lake Winnibigoshish.

Cass Lake Land Office Closes

The U. S. Land Office at Cass Lake, the last of Uncle Sam's land offices in Minnesota, was closed on Monday by order of President Hoover. The Cass Lake office along with three other land offices in various parts of the nation, are being closed because they showed deficits in operations last year. The Cass Lake deficit amounted to $2,174. In this, the last office to close, are the records of every land office, which at one time numbered thirty, ever operated in the state.

Before the days of the Civil war the Federal government opened its land offices in this state, because most of the land still belonged to Uncle Sam and people were clamoring for its settlement. Millions and millions of acres of this land have been sold and hundreds of thousands of acres deeded, or to use the Federal term, "patented" to the state.

Today only 300,000 acres of Federal land remain, which, according to P. M. Larson, in charge of the Cass Lake office for the last eight years, is not all salable, some of it being peat land in Koochiching and Lake of the Woods counties.

Tax Saving

According to figures released by the Minnesota Taxpayers Association late last week, the total tax reduction in Minnesota as made in 1932, payable in 1933 for all taxing units, with four counties missing, is $10,824,695. The four missing counties are Aitkin, Cass, Dodge and Hennepin. Of this total, the state has cut its property levies $1,329,421; the counties $2,273,581; the cities and villages, $1,411,837; the townships, $1,781,987 and the school districts, $3,824,563. This is a total tax saving through reduction of expenditures the last two years of $24,477,831, announces the association.

Many Deer Killed

Big game hunting in Minnesota was good last fall, with nimrods taking 39,594 deer, a record kill, according to a report issued by the state game and fish department.

In 1930 there were 27,810 deer taken. A total of 256 bears also were reported killed in 1932. More than 49,000 big game licences were sold and 24,323 hunters made reports.

Farmers Educational Week At Crookston Feb. 6-7-8-9-10

The 23d Annual Farmers' Week and Women's Meetings at the Northwest Experiment Station, Crookston, will occur February 6-7-8-9-10, beginning Monday of next week and ending Friday. Reduced rates on all railroads are in effect during these days.

An excellent program has been arranged for this week, consisting of farmers' and women's meetings, 4-H Club meetings, judging contests, demonstrations, livestock, crop, poultry and industrial exhibits, and special evening programs.

The three headliners on the speaking program, their subjects, and the date, are as follows:

Dr. George Mecklenburg, "Technocracy and Unemployment," Tuesday evening, Feb. 7.

Jack Miner, famous Canadian naturalist, "Value and Intelligence of Birds, and Migration," Wednesday evening, Feb. 8.

Dr. Laurence M. Gould, geologist and second in command of the Byrd Polar Expedition, an illustrated lecture, Thursday evening, Feb. 9.

Besides these, there will be various speakers, specialists in their line, at the farmers', women's, and 4H members' meetings.

The sun shone with dazzling brightness on the new snow yesterday, reminding one that there would be no doubt about the Ground Hog seeing his shadow. Is there anything to the old superstition about a late spring in such a case? We hope not. It seemeth to us that we have had enough winter already for this year.

Mr. Sjoberg of Middle River was in town yesterday inquiring for a valuable hunting dog which he had lost north of town.

Minnesota Has Smallest City

Minnesota boasts of the smallest city in the United States.

Frazer with 149 persons, was organized as a city of the fourth class on Jan. 26. This same section contains Hibbing, known as "the richest village in the world."

The decision of Judge Wright of Grand Rapids, which made Frazer a city, ends a legal battle that started when Frazer on Aug. 18, 1931, petitioned the judge of the eleventh district to appoint a board of freeholders who drew up a draft of the city charter which was adopted at a special election Sept. 1, 1931.

Quo warranto proceedings were instituted by the village of Chisholm which had planned to incorporate as a city to include Frazer, charging the latter community incorporated through pressure of mining companies. A trial was held at Hibbing in June, 1932, and a hearing last September.

John August Heinrich Wegge was born in Posen, Germany, on Jan. 22, 1857. Born of Lutheran parents, he was baptised and confirmed in the faith.

In his early twenties he was united in marriage to Augusta Katke. Shortly after his marriage the husband left his native land and joined the many who were seeking new homes beyond the distant seas. With this end in view he obtained work in New York City. After a year of this, his family joined him, and they moved west, settling on a farm in Sibley county, southern Minnesota.

After two years the family moved to their farm northeast of Holt, where Mr. Wegge spent his remaining days. His death occurred Jan. 21, 1933.

He leaves to mourn his loss a faithful wife, Augusta Wegge, and four children, Fred Wegge, Anna Wegge Beeks of Florida, Clara King of Holt, and Walter Wegge of Egeland, N. D. He also leaves a brother, Louis Wegge, and a number of grandchildren.

Oscar Pearson of Warren was in town last week arranging for relief of farmers in this section who were hailed out last summer. He also had charge of grasshopper control in Marshall county last year.

Past this, Landis' recollections were dim and confused. He remembered seeing the pistol upswung for a blow that descended once or a dozen times, he couldn't tell how many; that he had finally got a hand free to clutch at the merciless club that was beating his head to a pulp, and that when he did, there was a crash as if the roof of the tunnel had caved in.

Landis struggled from under an inert and heavy body. In the struggle for the possession of the clubbed pistol the weapon had been discharged and the bullet had plowed a furrow through the hair of the clubber. With a grim determination not to give up until he had made a finished job of it, Landis rubbed the blood out of his eyes, rolled the wounded man over and made shift to tie his hands behind him with his own pistol belt.

That done, he did the same for the other man, who had not yet recovered from the smashing blow given him at the beginning of the mad battle.

There was one thing more to be done, and he did it. Taking the black box down from its shelf, he laid it upon one of the cross-ties, and, with a fragment of ore for a hammer, beat and battered at it until it was reduced to a shapeless ruin.

Ten minutes later, dragging the ruin after him by one of its internal wires, he staggered into the mouth of the old working where he had left Betty, and heard dimly her cry of dismay or relief, or both, as she caught him in her arms. After which the waves of a deep sea of unconsciousness rolled over him and he knew no more.

CHAPTER XIII

A Confession and a Temperature

When Landis began to come to a realization of things as they are, he found himself in bed.

At his stirring, somebody tiptoed across the room to the bedside and he saw Wally bending over him and heard him say, "Thank God, Owen, old boy! We were beginning to think you were never going to come back to us! How are you feeling?"

"Like the morning after. What's the matter with my head?"

"Oh, nothing much; just looked as if it had been run through a sausage mill when we brought you out of the mine. You must have had the time of your young life with those two assassins."

"I did," said the Berserker, to whom recollection was slowly returning. Then, "Fill it out for me, Wally. What happened, and why did it happen? And is Betty all right?"

"She is. In the mine we found you and Betty, and, a little farther on, your victims. You must have put up a whale of a scrap with those two fellows—both of them with guns and you with only your bare hands."

"Not bare—quite; I had a shovel to begin with. But never mind the scrap. Tell me what Canby and his gunmen were doing, or trying to do, and why they had my black box."

Beginning at the Hillcrest visit Markham ran rapidly over the events of the kidnaping evening, the holdups on the way to town, his leaving Betty at the Stillings house and his return to the hotel in time to witness the arrival of the real Fleming, Cantrell and Martin from Louisville.

"The clerk had just told me that you'd been called over to Starbuck's office; and knowing, or thinking I knew, that Starbuck wasn't in town, I went over to see for myself," and then he briefed the story of the bogus bookkeeper, and the resultant wild-goose chase into the northern hills.

"But still you haven't told me the why," Landis complained.

"I'm coming to that. As I said, I was thrashing it out with Stillings in the lobby of the hotel, and just as Stillings said, 'Lord, I wish Starbuck were here,' Cousin Billy walked in on us. Then I did what we should have done at first; gave him the whole layout, beginning with the theft of the black box. 'Canby's the man,' he said; and in less than no time he had the sheriff on the wire and a posse sworn in and we were on the way to the Quavapai.

"As we were about to pass the Little Alice, a man came running out to say that somebody was digging into the Alice vein from the south; that the men in the Alice had just heard the air drills as if they were only a few feet away. That settled it, and within the next half hour everybody connected with the Quavapai was under arrest, and one of Canby's accomplices had weakened and told us that you and Betty were shut up in the old workings. At this, the posse split; half of it going into the old mine to look for you two, and the other half taking possession of the new workings."

"You found out the 'why' then?"

"Yes, we found out what Canby had done. There was no mineral in the Quavapai; there hadn't been from the beginning. But Canby was stuck, himself, and he framed it to stick somebody else. What he did was to drive a tunnel all the way through the mountain to tap the real stuff in the Alice. When the robber tunnel got so near there was danger of the drilling and blasting being heard in the Alice, he was stumped until he happened to hear of your invention through one of his gang members who had spied upon you in your lab.

"We have found out that he is the secret head—and brains—of a criminal organization that is almost nation wide. He got the three Louisville magnates on the string and they agreed to buy the Quavapai if it proved to be as he represented it. The tunneling through the mountain had cost a lot of money, and Canby had put everything he had into it. If he could make the turn and sell the mine, he stood to clean up with a couple of millions, or more. But more money was needed, so he turned the black box over to his three yeggmen and told them to pick what they could in the way of ready cash on their way out here. And it was one of his little refinements of audacity to have them pose as the three Louisville magnates on the western trip."

"It worked," said Landis.

"Yes, until we butted in. When the three found out we were on their trail, they yelled for help, and Canby jumped in to try and balk us until the black box had enabled the miners to get well into the Alice vein and the sale to the Louisville people had been made. After that, Canby could snap his fingers at all of us."

Landis made no comment for a minute or so. But after a little pause he said, "I'm mighty sorry for Betty. It's a horrible ending to her little romance." Then, "It was Canby who stole my box, of course. But who was the woman who helped him? Has she been traced?"

"I don't think the woman will ever be found. But we can afford to let her go. I'll quit you now and send the nurse in. You've had enough excitement for one day."

Landis heard her when she came in and crossed the room, and was inclined to be rebellious when he felt her sit down on the edge of the bed. That was an odd thing for a nurse to do, he thought. When she continued to sit there, he opened his eye a sixteenth of an inch to see what she looked like. Before he could determine, a low voice said, "Don't be so bashful, Owen, dear; it's nobody but me."

"Betty!" he gasped, coming wide-eyed. "Did—did Wally mean you when he said 'nurse'?"

She nodded. "I've been waiting. The doctor said you might be yourself again some time today. Is your poor head hurting awfully?"

"It feels as if I'd lost it and got a cracked dinner pot in its place. What day is it? I forgot to ask Wally."

"It's Wednesday—the day after, you know. It was yesterday you had that dreadful fight in the mine."

He looked away from her when he asked the question:

"What became of Canby?"

"He is in jail."

"Poor girl!"

"Why am I poor?"

"I shouldn't think you'd need to ask. Weren't you going to marry him?"

"No; not if he were the last man on earth."

"But, Betty—"

"I know. Wally has told you his story, and now I've got to tell you mine. I'm going to tell you just what happened, and then you'll hate me. You know now why Bert Canby wanted to get all three of us out of the way, don't you?"

"I know why he wanted to obliterate Wally and me. But you—"

"He was just as much afraid of me as he was of you and Wally."

"But you came out here with him in his car."

"Yes; with daddy along. And we hadn't come very far before I was glad daddy had accepted his invitation. In just a little while I knew there was something terribly wrong going on, and that you and Wally were mixed up in it some way. After that, I tried and tried to find out what it was; why you and Wally seemed to be trying to catch up with three men ahead of us, with Bert trying to get to them first."

"Well, you know now, don't you? It was that black box of mine. Wally has told you about the box—my noise-killer—hasn't he?"

When she nodded assent, he went on. "There were three banks and a mine commissary blown up, wrecked and looted, on the way out here, and not in any of the places did anybody hear a sound."

"You think those three men stole your invention? Where did you keep it?"

"In the safe in my workshop."

"When was it stolen?"

"On the night when you acted so well as leading lady. Do you remember, in the first interlude, how the orchestra made a queer break, right in the middle of a passage?"

"We all noticed it."

"I had the box with me, and I had it switched on for a few seconds to show Wally what it would do. After the play, Wally went with me to my lab, and we talked about it. Just before he left, I put the box in the safe and locked it up. In the morning the safe was open and the box gone. I phoned for Wally and he came right over. We found the tracks of an auto in the alley, and footprints between the line fence and my shop."

"What kind of footprints?"

"There was only one that was plain; it was the print of a woman's shoe in the soft earth under the lab. window. Wally made a plaster cast of it, but I don't know what he did with it."

"I know."

"You do? Did he tell you?"

"No; but just the same, I know. He went straight to our house and went up to my bedroom and compared the cast with one of my shoes."

"What? Good heavens—you must have dreamed that!"

"No, I didn't dream it. There was nobody but Olga, the maid, in the house when Wally got there. Olga told Wally I'd be home in a few minutes and showed him into the living room. When she got back to the kitchen she thought she heard somebody upstairs. She slipped up the back way and saw Wally. He was in my room and had one of my shoes in one hand, and in the other a white thing that looked like part of a shoe. She told me after he'd gone, and then I knew."

"You'll have to make it plainer. My old head isn't functioning very well, just now. What did you know?"

"It all came to me like a dim recollection of a bad dream. I seemed to see myself kneeling before your safe and opening it and taking something from it. Don't you remember how you once showed me how to work the combination?"

"But, Betty! That's simply impossible. You couldn't have remembered the combination."

"No; I'd forgotten it almost as soon as you showed me, and I don't remember it now. But don't the psychologists tell us that the subconscious mind never forgets anything?"

"You're getting in too deep for me now. But it's all perfectly ridiculous, anyway. You wouldn't do such a thing as that!"

"Of course I wouldn't—not willingly. But can't you imagine me doing it unwillingly?"

"No!"

"Then I'll have to tell you something I thought I'd never tell anyone. You know Bert Canby drove me to the theater that night, don't you?"

"Yes."

"After the play, he took me to Pozzoni's for supper. I was awfully tired, and before the supper was over I began to get so sleepy that I could hardly hold my eyes open. When we left the restaurant I can just remember Bert's helping me into his car; and after that I can't remember anything until I seemed to come awake as he was helping me out at our front door."

"D—n him!" gritted Landis out of a full heart. "If they ever let him out of jail I'm going to kill him! Did—did he hypnotize you?"

"I haven't wanted to believe it; it's too horrible. But I'm afraid it's true, Owen. At first, I thought I'd just dropped off for a few minutes while he was driving me home. Then what Olga told me about Wally and my shoes scared me, though I didn't know then that your safe had been burglarized, or that anything had gone wrong. But when I went to my room that night and looked at the clock, I knew we hadn't come straight home from Pozzoni's. It made me furious to think that anybody had the power to turn me into a puppet—a plaything! That is why I didn't object when Bert invited us to drive out here with him. I meant to make him tell me what he'd done to me—or what he'd made me do."

"But he didn't tell you, did he?"

"You'd know he wouldn't. Every time I asked him about that drive home, he'd laugh and say that I went to sleep, and that he just drove around town for a while to let me have my nap out. Since we've been in Brewster I've felt that he was trying it again—trying to get the control, I mean. I could feel his will pushing hard against mine, and now I know why. He was afraid I might remember."

Landis was silent for a little time after she stopped. Then he said, "I'm pretty badly up in the air, Betty. You see, I've been thinking, all along—with everybody else—that you were in love with Canby. I was sure of it. Now you've left me sort of gaping. But I—I'm awfully glad, you know—for Wally's sake."

"For Wally's sake?" she said, with the quaint little grimace that had always made him want to kiss her. Then she laughed. "I wonder if there ever was another man so maddeningly, so exasperatingly—oh, I can't find words for it! Have I got to tell you right out plain that there has never been anybody but you, just you, always, you dear, dense, absent-minded, self-forgetting dreamer? Haven't you known that?"

"My G—d!" he breathed. "Have I been that stupid and blind, Betty? But you know, don't you, that I've always loved you, and that I haven't told you so only because I wanted to be able—I mean, I was waiting until I could offer you something more than my love and a bare living. And I haven't any more than these to offer you now, for there'll be no more experiments with things like the black box. And when Canby butted in I thought I'd lost you."

"Foolish boy," she said softly. "Don't you know you couldn't lose me if you should try ever so hard?" Then, "Listen—here comes the doctor making his round! If he finds me here instead of the nurse that I bribed to let me in, he'll murder me. Kiss me quick, dear, and let me run. And don't you dare have a temperature when he comes in!"

But after she had fled, and the house physician, bearded, fierce-eyed and savagely professional, had come and had applied his thermometer—to read it with a frown and a growl—Landis grinned and said, "Never mind a bit of temperature, Doctor. If you'd been through what I have, you'd have a hundred and five and still be calling it normal. I'm all right. You couldn't kill me now with a baseball bat. I've got too much to live for!"

LIFE SPAN UNCHANGED

Despite the tremendous strides of the last three decades in the fields of medicine, sanitation and public health, the average life span in the United States will not be materially increased in the future. This was the opinion advanced by the chief statistician of a prominent insurance company. He predicted the ultimate conquest of tuberculosis and the continued elimination of many of the causes of infant death, but the so-called "degenerative diseases," such as heart trouble, diabetes and cancer, which attack particularly the age groups above forty, had so far proved unconquerable, he said. Science has been able to do but little for the man of middle age and older, and in some cases life expectancy in these groups had actually decreased within the last ten years.

Take 1 or 2 Bayer Aspirin Tablets.
Drink Full Glass of Water.
If throat is sore, crush and dissolve 3 Bayer Aspirin Tablets in a half glass of warm water and gargle according to directions.

Almost Instant Relief In This Way

If you have a cold—don't take chances with "cold killers" and nostrums. A cold is too dangerous to take chances on.

The simple method pictured above is the way doctors throughout the world now treat colds.

It is recognized as the QUICKEST, safest, surest way. For it will check an ordinary cold almost as fast as you caught it.

That is because the real BAYER Aspirin embodies certain medical qualities that strike at the base of a cold almost INSTANTLY.

You can combat nearly any cold you get simply by taking BAYER Aspirin and drinking plenty of water every 2 to 4 hours the first day and 3 or 4 times daily thereafter. If throat is sore, gargle with 3 BAYER Aspirin Tablets crushed and dissolved in a half glass of warm water, repeating every 2 or 3 hours as necessary. Sore throat eases this way in a few minutes, incredible as this may seem.

Ask your doctor about this. And when you buy, see that you get the real BAYER Aspirin Tablets. They dissolve almost instantly. And thus work almost instantly when you take them. And for a gargle, Genuine Bayer Aspirin Tablets dissolve with sufficient speed and completeness, leaving no irritating particles or grittiness. Get a box of 12 or bottle of 100 at any drug store.

"Seein' Is Believin'" Is A Good Rule To Follow

Jed Hopkins, The Philosopher Who Never Went To College

WELL folks, yu know, it's sometimes hardest fer a feller to see what's right in under his own nose.

Take th' other day fer instance when I stepped over to Lem Pawley's general store to mail a letter fer a gadget I read about. Lem's got th' post offis too. Well, jus' as I wuz gonna buy me a stamp fer th' letter, what shud I see but th' very same gadget I wuz sendin' in fer. An' then Lem comes up.

So I sez to Lem, "Lem, how come yu got these gadgets in here. Didn't think anybody roun' these parts had such things. An' . . ."

"That's jus' it, Jed," Lem sez, "Yu didn't think. But I don't know as I blame yu in petickaler, becuz that's th' way with most folks. They just don't seem t' know that they c'n come in here and get pretty nigh anything they want. An' maybe after they seen it, maybe they wouldn't want it. F'r instance, now, yu take this here gadget an' . . ."

Well, folks, I wuz sure some surprised. Lem gits out a hull case an' lays about two dozen different kinds o' gadgets on the counter an' says, "Now Jed, I wants yu to pick 'em up and heft 'em. An' then I'll leave it up to yu which one's the one yu oughta have."

Say, yu coulda knocked me over with a feather. Fer the first 3 I picked up wuz jus' no good to me atall. Nossir! But th' 4th one wuz a daisy. So I bought it right then and there. An' I been mighty happy with it ever since.

Course now there's a moral to this story like there is to everything. An' it's this—"Seein' is believin'" is th' best policy. Becuz yu ain't so likely to be disappointed none.

Anyways it's kinda unfair to fellers like Lem not to stop in an' look over what they got. Speshully considerin' how Lem's kind always goes to so much trouble to please. An' gives yu a chance to see and heft things before yu buys. An' if it ain't right yu c'n always take it back to Lem. An' Lem, well, Lem he always makes good—with a smile.

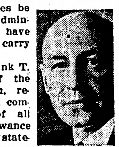
MANY Republican politicians expect that President Hoover will attempt a comeback and vindication in 1936 and consequently believe that he seeks to retain control of the party. The "old line" element in the party intends to stop this if possible, and hence schemed to prevent a plan to hold a meeting of the national committee before March 4, feeling that after Mr. Hoover has left office he will not so easily dominate that body. More than a majority of the committee were said to have gone on record against a meeting before the close of the administration. In Washington it was said that the national and congressional committees would be reorganized and that probably National Chairman Everett Sanders would be forced out or resign.

PENDING congressional action on the recommendation that 63 per cent of the disability allowances now received by veterans for nonservice connected injuries be discontinued, administrative steps have been taken to carry out that plan.



Gen. Hines

Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, head of the veterans' bureau, recently ordered a complete review of all disability allowance claims, with the statement that it was a purely "routine" move. The review order, it was revealed, however, followed the adoption of changes in the disability allowance regulations, under which veterans whose claims have been allowed heretofore, no longer will be eligible for the federal benefits.

Under the old regulations disability allowance has been paid to veterans who could prove permanent disability of 25 per cent or more, and they were permitted to add up their disabilities to make the minimum. Now they must prove a single disability of 20 per cent, though the minimum remains at 25 per cent. General Hines has recommended that the minimum be raised to 50 per cent disability, stating that such a move would eliminate 68 per cent of the veterans now receiving benefits for disability in no way connected with military service, and would save more than $51,000,000 a year.

JAMES A. STILLMAN, former New York banker whose marital troubles filled so much newspaper space ten years ago, is again in the limelight. Luc Rochefort, a French-Canadian who once ran for mayor of Montreal, accuses Stillman of alienating his wife's affections and has brought suit against him in a Brooklyn court for $1,000,000 damages.

The suit came to light when Rochefort's attorney filed a motion in the court in connection with another suit he was prepared to file against Stillman—a $25,000 libel action resulting from blackmail accusations.

Stillman's counsel, Malcolm Sumner, said that his client had refused a suggestion by Rochefort's lawyer that the alienation case be settled for $25,000; that "he did not regard his relations with Mrs. Rochefort warranted any claim being made against him," and that he would fight both actions, if necessary, in open court.

In an affidavit presented to the court Stillman's counsel charged the libel action had been brought "for the deliberate ulterior purpose of using and abusing the process of the court in a scandalous, improper and unprofessional manner in order to harass and intimidate the defendant, a man of wealth and prominence."

POPE PIUS XI issued the bull he promised some time ago, proclaiming an extraordinary holy year of prayer, penance and pilgrimage to Rome to bring peace and quiet to a distracted world. This holy year, the pope said, is in commemoration of the nineteenth centenary of Christ's redemption of mankind. He urged prayer and penance, not only for the faithful, but for "all mankind led astray by so many errors, torn by so many discords and hostility, laboring under so many miseries and fearful of so many dangers."

FINANCE MINISTER CHERON submitted his budget to the French chamber of deputies, and in it no mention was made of the war debts France owes to the United States. Tea Dainties That Are "All Your Own"

Useful Suggestions About Preparation of Cakes and Sandwiches.

When I have a tea I like to make the sandwiches and the little cakes myself. Of course, I can't do it every time a few people drop in for a cup of tea, but when I plan ahead to ask a number of my friends I try to find time to make one of "the specialties of the house" myself.

For my usual holiday tea I make ahead—several days ahead, because they improve with age—two or three different kinds of little cakes. This year I chose brownies, and made up four times the usual recipe, enough to fill three medium sized and one large pan. These could be baked all at one time on the two shelves of my oven. They took about twenty-five minutes at 325 degrees Fahrenheit to bake. A moment or two after they came out of the oven I cut them in squares with a sharp knife, which I have found cuts better and leaves no ragged edge if it is wet. A long knife is better than a short one. It is little points of this sort which make results of cooking certain. Perhaps I had better mention that using melted butter for greasing the pan is best, and that the slow oven is necessary. You will notice that my brownie recipe uses a method of mixing unlike those of other recipes. I I find this method of combining the ingredients makes a soft cake which will remain soft if it is kept over a number of weeks. I have some left over which are in a tightly covered tin box and which will remain soft until I use them.

I also made up some little nut cakes which always were part of the Christmas preparation in my childhood. I had mislaid the recipe and had to do a little experimenting before I got a result on which the members of my family gathered for Christmas would put their sign of approval. When you look at the recipe you may say to yourself, "that is nothing but a macaroon." It is quite different in texture, however, probably because of the flour. This mixture is dropped by the teaspoonful on a well-greased sheet in little rounds which should be at least an inch apart. By the way, if you are buying cookie sheets I advise the light tin rather than the dark, as for some good physical reason which I have quite forgotten they do not allow the cookie to burn as quickly on the bottom as do the dark pans.

The nuts for these little cakes, by the way, must be cut finer than for the brownies. These cakes need an even slower oven than the brownies—300 degrees Fahrenheit—and take about twenty-five minutes to bake. If you hurry them they will stick to the pan and break when you try to take them off. Use a spatula to remove them and begin as soon as they come out of the oven. If they get hard, put the pan back into the oven a moment.

Now for sandwiches. I am especially fond of flavored butter for filling. Equal parts of butter and crushed watercress flavored discreetly with onion juice and lemon juice make a perfect filling. Mustard anchovy paste, chili sauce or horseradish are other suggestions, which should be added to taste. If you like to have some especially attractive sandwiches, cut all crusts except the bottom from the loaf of bread, spread the filling lengthwise of the loaf, and you can easily slice. Put this spread slice on a damp cloth and roll it quickly. If bread is very fresh, you can do rolling without the cloth. Seal the edge with butter, wrap in oiled or parchment paper and put in the refrigerator until ready to use, when the roll should be sliced.

Whole wheat bread spread with roquefort cheese mixed with butter, or with cottage cheese mixed with minced olives and a bit of onion, is another suggestion. Crabmeat with minced celery, onion and mayonnaise on white bread is even better.

It is a good idea to let the shape of the sandwich indicate its filling. Finger-length squares and triangles are plainer shapes which have little waste. Rounds, diamonds, clubs, stars, etc., are attractive but use up material uselessly.

Sandwiches as they are made should either be wrapped in paper and put in the refrigerator, or put on a slightly damp cloth in a pan and covered with a damp cloth.

With salted nuts and candies and well-made coffee and tea, besides the above mentioned food, or something of their nature, you will have satisfied guests who may like to come again when you ask them.

BURNT ALMOND FROSTING

- ½ cup butter.
- 1½ cups confectioner's sugar.
- ½ cup almonds.

Cream butter add the sugar and the egg yolk. Spread on the cake when ready to use. Blanch the almonds, bake in a moderate oven until light brown. Cut in pieces and sprinkle on the frosting.

BROWNIES

- 1 egg.
- ¼ cup melted butter.
- 1 cup granulated sugar (or 1½ cups brown sugar).
- 2 tablespoons water.
- 2 squares chocolate.
- ⅝ cup pastry, flour (or ⅝ cup bread flour and 2 tablespoonfuls corn starch).
- ¼ teaspoon salt.
- ⅛ teaspoon baking powder.
- ½ cup cut nuts.

Beat egg slightly, stir in melted butter. Stir in sugar and add water. Beat a half minute; add chocolate (melted). Add nuts to flour, salt and baking powder which have been sifted together, and add to first mixture. Bake in greased cake pan twenty-five to thirty minutes in a slow oven, 820 degrees Fahrenheit. Remove from oven; cool slightly and cut into squares.

The recipes are the selection of famous magazine cooking editors collaborating with Betty Crocker, world-noted Gold Medal expert. Then given to wives throughout the United States to try on their husbands.

Try this recipe on your husband. What happens will delight you both. And—you'll find Betty Crocker's Stollen surprisingly easy to make.

Home Baking Now Greatly Simplified

By the development of a new type of flour—GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour—baking has been remarkably simplified for the housewife. And the cause of most baking disappointments banished—lack of uniformity in the flour used; the chance of two sacks of the same brand varying greatly in results.

GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour means flour that has been tested in a home oven, just like yours, for uniformity of results, before it goes to you. Every batch tested for home baking of cakes, pies, pastries, breads, by a number of experts directed by the noted cooking authority, Betty Crocker.

"Kitchen-tested" Recipes are likewise "Kitchen-tested" scientifically the same way. Thus the flour acts the same way, the recipe the same way every time you bake. No guesswork, no uncertainty. Results are unvarying. Baking simplified amazingly.

For the Great Kitchen Thrill, try this way today. Get GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Flour at any grocery store. The "Kitchen-tested" Recipes For Foods Men Like—including the one for Betty Crocker's Stollen—are inside the sack.

THE BEST BAKERS today are making fine cakes on which you can rely when company comes, when you entertain, or when you want a fine cake in a hurry. And remember, baker's bread is still the "staff of life."

Canned Foods for Farmers

WHAT! Canned foods for farmers? Certainly. Lots of them. All year round. Housewives who live in the country know good fruits and vegetables, and they insist upon having them. They can't have fresh foods all year round until winter has been abolished, and they know that canned foods are grown from selected seeds, cultivated by the most modern scientific methods, and that they are as near uniform as is possible in this imperfect world. They know, too, that canned foods are picked, packed and processed at the moment of prime ripeness and under the very best conditions. So these are the foods which the country housewife is using today to solve her problems. One of the most serious of these problems used to be the twenty-four hour work day which gave rise to that old despairing jingle:

But a woman's work is never done."

Now country housewives have come out of the kitchen. They no longer spend endless hours in hard work over hot stoves. The pioneering days when each farm was a self-sustaining unit are over and done with.

Time Now for Good Times

Today it would be just as absurd for a woman to prepare all her food from the raw state in the kitchen as would be for her to raise sheep for wool, spin and weave it and make it into clothes. She knows that in many cases it is cheaper to buy her fruits and vegetables commercially canned than it is to can them at home, and that the use of them has gained her time to share with her neighbors in community activities and time to have good times with her family.

Another result is that rural housewives are growing to appreciate more and more the value of good foods, and through the proper selection and balance of the diets which they serve they are bringing up their health records and decreasing their doctor's bills. The Surgeon General of the United States recently reported that 1931 was the most healthful year we have ever had.

A glance at the larder of any up-to-date farm will quickly convince you that the country woman is just as clever about labor saving as her sister in the city or her husband in the fields. In fact you'll find the farm cupboard well stocked with exactly the same canned foods that you find in any city or suburban pantry. Canned foods are one form of farm relief that has really worked.

You'll find in the average farm house, for instance, a variety of soups all ready to serve, either by themselves or as sauce for other foods. Also vegetables — more kinds than a farmer's wife could possibly raise in a kitchen garden — ready to be served in many different ways—creamed or buttered with the main course, in salads, or as entrées. Fruits, too, —for no farm can grow fruit all year around — and commercial canning is the only safe and certain way of keeping fruits as good throughout the entire year as they were when they were fresh-picked.

The rest of the cupboard you'll find filled with a variety of specialty foods such as canned sea foods, canned chicken, pork and beans and spaghetti, to name only a few that are now in wide use.

Lets Others Work

Does the country dweller of today do much of this canning herself? Not if she's wise. People who have never done it are apt to speak lightly of peeling a couple of boxes of peaches or tomatoes. But a woman who has stood by a stove inferno while the blinding sunlight outside raised the temperature up in the nineties has no illusions about how much work it takes to prepare food for the cans—not to mention the weary hours of watching and care before they are ready at last to be put away on the shelves. She knows that commercial canners do it better with their marvelous modern machinery, and she knows, too, that she can get good bargains from them if she buys her canned foods by the case.*

HEALTH AND UNCLE SAM

NOT only through the Federal Food and Drugs Act but by means of his own vast purchases of food Uncle Sam constantly safeguards the health of this nation. He tests every bit of the latter which he buys, as well as having the Food and Drug Administration of the United States Department of Agriculture enforce the above mentioned act, and the effects of all this regulatory work are far reaching. A pamphlet entitled, "Marketing with Uncle Sam", issued by that Department, states:

"As an indirect result of the administration of the food and drugs law, the packers, jobbers, canners, manufacturers have reaped substantial benefit. The honest manufacturer has been taught how to bring his products and his labels into compliance with the law, while the dishonest competitor has been forced, sometimes not too gently, into the path of business rectitude. The result is better foods and better business. The majority of manufacturers market an honest, high-grade product. The sane administration of the law helps them to this end."

Feeding a Huge Family

But it is not by law alone that Uncle Sam helps to keep all the foods offered to his nieces and nephews wholesome and healthy. Here is part of what the pamphlet has to say about his purchases for his official family:

"When Uncle Sam counts noses, or rather stomachs, he is apt to start with large organizations, like the Army and Navy.

"During 1929, the Army led off with 118,000 enlisted men to feed, and, in addition, purchased food for Philippine scouts, over 6,000 of them, for general prisoners, employees on cable ships mine planters, the vessels of the Army transport service, etc.

"The Navy marches a close second, having subsisted 72,000 during 1929. This number is exclusive of 15,200 marines who are provided for directly by the U. S. Marine Corps.

"Next comes the Department of Justice with 24,000 prisoners to feed. Then the Department of Commerce under whose jurisdiction come employees of the vessel service of the navigation and lighthouse branches, Coast and Geodetic Survey, Fisheries, Mines, etc."

And Still More Mouths

The pamphlet next refers to the survivors of the World War. This group is under the direct supervision of the U. S. Veterans' Bureau.

"The magnitude of the problem involved in the selection and purchase of food for these veterans is apparent when it is realized that there are 18,000 of them in fifty hospitals in as many towns, and that food for these shell-shocked, war-torn boys must be chosen to nourish and strengthen, as well as satisfy the vagaries of the sick.

"And even yet we have not mentioned all of the official family. There are forest rangers who patrol the vast domain of the national reserves and parks, the inmates of Indian schools, of prisons and reformatories, and institutions for the mentally deficient and physically incapacitated.

"Direct fitness is only one of the [illegible] to be considered when Uncle Sam goes to market. Color, taste, flavor, appearance, and grade or quality are all given weight in choosing the food. The essential qualifications and requirements are fully set forth in specifications, drafted by a committee appointed for the purpose. The samples are judged on the basis of the specification requirements, and the contract is awarded to the lowest bidder whose product meets these requirements.

"Practically all Government specifications, covering the purchases of foods, contain a clause that all deliveries shall conform to the provisions of the Federal food and drugs act. . . .

"When the samples are received in the laboratory they are lined up on a long table, each one bearing an identification number. Vegetables, fruit and fish are generally in large, hermetically sealed tin containers. These are opened and the contents weighed or measured, to determine whether or not the quantity in the can agrees with the declaration on it which the law requires shall appear on the outside of the package."

A Complete Cross-Section

The supplies include practically every known food that comes in a can, besides such staples as flour and cereal foods, cocoa, coffee, cheese and dried fruits, and offer a complete cross-section of all the processed foods produced in the United States, thus affording wide protection to the general public as well as their consumers in Uncle Sam's official family.*

Sells Meat Market

H. T. Larson, local butcher, who came here about five years ago and took over the City Meat Market, then operated by O. J. Backlund, has this week closed a deal with Martin Smeby from Newfolden in which he sold all fixtures and stock here. Mr. Smeby will move the shop equipment to Newfolden and install it in his general store as soon as weather permits.

Mr. Larson will go to Oslo to operate a grocery store and meat market in company with his brother, Wm. Larson of Newfolden, who has been operating the meat market there. They will take the shop equipment from there and put in their new store at Oslo.

Walter Sandberg, who is at the present time operating the Cities Service Station here, will open a meat market here as soon as he can get new equipment installed, he has already leased the building that Mr. Larson used for his shop.

Larson stated that he will be spending about a week here after closing his shop, to clean up outstanding accounts and make arrangements for moving.

Mr. Larson has given the people of Holt and community the best of service all the time and we are sorry to say that his business has been encroached upon to such an extent that he decided to move out.

Death of Audrey Sorenson

Funeral services were conducted here yesterday from the Free Mission church for Audrey Sorenson, the oldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. J. Sorenson. Miss Sorenson passed away at the home of her parents on Sunday morning after a lingering illness of several months duration.

Rev. Myhrer officiated and interment was made in the Holt cemetery.

About Auto Licenses

Both brances of the Minnesota legislature this week approved a bill extending the deadline on which automobile license fees may be paid without penalty from February 15 to April 1, according an announcement we have just received from State Senator Wm. L. Peterson.

The bill became a law with the signature of Governor Olson. Under the terms of the bill, new plates must be attached to cars by May 15, the time having been extended from April 1 as in former years.

A bill to reduce the auto license fees by fifty per cent, is creating a good deal of interest, and while it has the approval of the senate committee it has run into a snag in the house committee. It is also reported that Governor Olson considers the cut too drastic. At the present time some sort of reduction seems likely, although the extent of the reduction is very much in doubt.

Abraham Lincoln

Far-seeing leadership, that always had in mind the welfare of humanity, the freeing of the common man from shackles of ignorance and indifference,—such was the life-work of Abraham Lincoln.

Present-day conditions,—depression, crashing of gigantic corporations, and general dog-eat-dog activities,—are the result of greedy, grasping commercialism that thinks only of getting wealth and more wealth. It is sad but true that none of our present-day "leaders" are of the Lincoln type. A program of selfishness of the sort displayed by our big corporation heads, is bound to fall through.

We need more of Abe Lincoln's humanitarian ideas in these dark days,—philosophy that thinks of the other fellow, philosophy that is expressed in the Golden Rule: "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you."

Fire Damage Claims High

The state was asked to pay $214,683.84 to victims of forest fires that raged in Beltrami, Lake of the Woods and Koochiching counties in August, 1930, and September, 1931, in bills introduced in the legislature last week.

There are ninety-eight separate claims in the measure presented in the house by Representatives Gustaf Erickson, of Spooner, and E. J. Chilgren, of International Falls, and in the senate by Senator H. A. Bridgeman, of Bemidji. Some more claims are expected to be filed later.

The bill cites that the "fire was spread by winds from certain peat fires in those territories, negligently allowed to get out of control by the State of Minnesota through its agencies for the prevention of fires."

The claims range in amount from $470 to $19,630. One of the big claims is that of Gus Palm of the Hay Creek district in Lake of the Woods county, amounting to $19,044.25.

Note—We know that some of the farmers in the burned over area had pretty good homes and should be entitled to damages but, we also know that some of those who have filed big claims did not have much and should not be allowed to tap the state for a big profit above their actual loss. Another thing that we can't understand is that the representatives actually will push for such a bill when they know that some of the claims are unjust and too high according to what some of the farmers had before the fire and what some with high claims had left after the fire. Why not investigate again and get the facts.

Governor's Proclamation

Advocating exclusive use of Minnesota made sugar within the state.

Few people realize the magninude of the beet sugar industry in our state.

An investigation reveals that during the past year the farmers of Minnesota have received for their sugar beets the sum of $2,500,000 00; labor has been paid approximately $1,000,000; railroads have received $1,210,000; limestone quarries, $45,000; and bag manufacturers, $175,000. Approximately $90,000.00 has been paid by this industry to the state and local subdivisions of government in the form of taxes.

This is ample evidence of the fact that the beet sugar industry is one of vital importance to our citizens and should be encouraged.

Analysis of Minnesota-made sugar verifies the statement that this sugar, distributed under the trade name of "Crystal Sugar," is the equal of any other brand of sugar for household and commercial use. There is no reason, therefore, why sugar grown and manufactured in Minnesota cannot be entirely consumed in this state. It should be unnecessary to seek an outside market, since at the present time only one-fourth of the sugar consumed by Minnesota people is grown and manufactured here.

As Governor, I am pleased to urge the consumption of our Minnesota-made sugar. Such consumption will particularly aid our farmer-growers, many of whom consider sugar beets their principal crop.

Governor Floyd B. Olson

Iced Coffee Becoming Popular Summer Drink

Because of its refreshing and invigorating qualities, iced coffee is becoming more popular every summer. If properly made, it is a delightful beverage.

Freshly made, steaming hot coffee should be poured into glasses filled with cracked ice, and either served clear or with cream and sugar. To compensate for the dilution caused by the melting ice, the coffee should be made a little stronger than usual, about 1½ tablespoons per cup suiting the average taste.

Coffee, because of its general appeal, also is being used in countless recipes, for the making of mousse, cakes, gelatine, salads and desserts.

Doubtless due to these varied new uses, as well as its increasing popularity as an all-year-round beverage in America, coffee consumption in the United States last year was 14.2 pounds per capita, the highest figure in history. Practically all of the coffee consumed in this country is grown in South America. More than one-fourth of the coffee imported for domestic consumption is grown in Colombia, which is the world's largest quantity producer of grades known as "milds," and ranks second in point of total production.

The finest coffees are grown on mountain sides at altitudes ranging between 2,500 and 6,500 feet above sea level. The topography of Colombia is ideal for coffee raising, because the country is crossed by three ranges of the Andean mountain system, on the slopes of which thousands of small planters produce the world's finest grades.

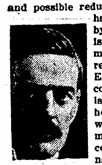
Chancellor Chamberlain Says Great Britain Wants War Debt Cancellation—Inflationists Lose in Senate—Lame Duck Amendment Ratified.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

GREAT BRITAIN has been invited to discuss with the United States the war debts with a view to revision and possible reduction, the invitation having been extended by the Hoover administration with the almost certain concurrence of President-Elect Roosevelt. The conference, if the British accept, will be held in March; and it will be followed immediately by similar conferences with the nations that are not in default in payment to this country, namely, Italy, Lithuania, Czechoslovakia, Finland and Latvia. But Secretary of State Stimson, in sending out the invitations, omitted France, Belgium, Poland, Hungary and Esthonia, the nations that have defaulted; and this, too, it is understood, met with the approval of Mr. Roosevelt, who will be President when the negotiations are under way.



Chancellor Chamberlain

However, there were indications in Washington that Mr. Roosevelt will have arranged separate conferences with the defaulters. England is especially interested in having France included in such arrangements as may be made, believing a final settlement of debt and economic subjects cannot well be reached unless France is taken into account.

Representative Rainey of Illinois, Democratic floor leader in the house, seemed to be roused by the news.

"The conferences won't amount to anything, in my opinion," Rainey said, "because the American people are not going to stand for a reduction in the debts.

"The debt conferences should be linked with the world economic conference. The thing to do is to bring about a removal of international trade barriers so that trade can be revived. The conferences already projected hold only a possibility of opening up trade routes and giving the debtors a chance to pay."

England accepted the invitation, and her stand on the war debt question was stated plainly by Chancellor Neville Chamberlain in an address before the Leeds Chamber of Commerce. Briefly, the British government will ask either cancellation or reduction so drastic that it will almost amount to the same thing. If this cannot be obtained, said Chamberlain, the settlement reached must be final and must not involve resumption of the German reparations. "To disturb the Lausanne agreement," he said, "would be to reopen old wounds and to destroy for an indefinite period all prospect of agreement on matters affecting the happiness and prosperity not merely of Europe but of the whole world."

Undertaking to explain the matter to "the farmer of the Middle West," the chancellor said that if the war debts payments were to be resumed they could not be made by loans or by further shipments of gold. "Effective means of paying," he continued, "would have to be found and they could only be found by increasing sales of foreign goods to America or, what would come to the same thing, by diminishing purchases from America."

THERE will be no more lame duck sessions of congress, for the Twentieth amendment to the Constitution has now been ratified by more than 36 states and will go into effect October 15 next. Action by the Missouri legislature clinched it, and several other legislatures came into line the same day. Under this amendment both senators and representatives assume office on January 3 following their election. The President and Vice President take office on January 20 following election. The newly elected congress is automatically called into session on January 3 and on the same date one year later. The changes do not affect the terms of Hoover and Curtis or any member of the present congress.

Sen. Norris

Adoption of the amendment is something of a personal victory for Senator Norris of Nebraska who fought for it through many years. It was passed by the senate several times but always previously was blocked in the house.

INFLATIONISTS are becoming more vociferous and apparently more numerous daily in Washington, but at this writing they have not got anywhere. Their first big effort was put forth during debate on the Glass banking bill in the senate. Wheeler of Montana, independent Democrat, offered an amendment providing for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of sixteen to one—the old formula of William Jennings Bryan—and Huey Long of Louisiana proposed another amendment authorizing the government purchase of silver and stabilization at approximately 14.38 to 1.

After violent discussion both these schemes were defeated, by a vote of 56 to 18 in each case.

During the debate Senator Tom Connally of Texas increased the perplexity of the senate by announcing he was preparing a measure to debase the gold content of the dollar by one-third and perhaps, if it were constitutional, to forbid individuals making contracts calling for payment in dollars of current weight and fineness. Both Senator Glass and Senator Fess argued strongly against all the inflation proposals, as did Reed of Pennsylvania.

After being badly mangled by amendments the Glass banking bill was passed by the senate. Its fate in the house is problematical.

FARMERS are to have the opportunity of borrowing $90,000,000 from Uncle Sam with which to produce this year's crops, unless the bill passed by congress is killed by a Presidential veto. The measure makes available the sum named of the unused balance of $200,000,000 of R. F. C. funds allocated to agriculture. The loans will be made for planting, fallowing and cultivation, and the secretary of agriculture is empowered to exact from borrowers agreements to reduce acreage not to exceed 30 per cent. One million dollars is allocated for feed for farm live stock in drought and storm stricken areas.

Farm bloc members of congress defended the bill, asserting there would be widespread suffering on the farms unless such loans were authorized. Many member, however, attacked it as paternalistic, socialistic and bound to increase farm product surpluses. Snell of New York, minority leader, declared it was utterly inconsistent with the pending domestic allotment measure, the purpose of which is to increase farm product prices and decrease acreage.

The senate agriculture committee began hearings on the domestic allotment bill Wednesday, hoping they would be completed in a week or so. The same arguments for and against it that were heard in the house were repeated.

MR. ROOSEVELT, in Warm Springs after his inspection of Muscle Shoals, was busy studying the problems that will come before him and conferred with many notable men of his party and a few who are not of that persuasion. Among his callers were several who, according to the cabinet makers, have good chances of being offered portfolios. Among these was Bronson Cutting, the senator from New Mexico who bolted the Republican ticket last fall and helped elect Roosevelt. The gossip was that he would be made secretary of the interior if he were willing to accept the place. Senator Cutting was accompanied on his visit by Senator La Follette of Wisconsin, another "rebel" Republican.

Sen. Cutting

Bernard M. Baruch of New York, chairman of the emergency national transportation committee, also was in Warm Springs helping the President-Elect prepare his program and giving advice especially on the railroad situation. There was talk that he might be appointed secretary of state, probably the only cabinet position he would take, though many still thought that position would go to either Senator Walsh of Montana, Owen D. Young or Norman Davis. Mr. Roosevelt told the correspondents he might announce one cabinet choice before going on his yacht trip, but no more than one. Presumably that will be Jim Farley, who it is conceded will be postmaster general.

PRESIDENT HOOVER vetoed the first deficiency bill, carrying appropriations of $31,000,000 and the house upheld his action, the vote being 192 to 158. The President disapproved of the measure because he and Attorney General Mitchell held unconstitutional a provision placing control of all substantial refunds from income, gift and inheritance taxes in the hands of a joint congressional committee. Senator McKellar indicated that he would make another attempt to remove control over refunds from the treasury.

ELIMINATION of the citizens' military training camps as an economy move was rejected by the house, which added $2,500,000 to the War department appropriation bill to insure their continuance. Also $500,000 was added to the appropriation for the reserve officers' corps. The measure was then passed.

The senate finance committee reported the house beer bill amended to include wine and to provide 3.05 per cent alcoholic content. This measure may get through congress before adjournment but probably will be vetoed if it does.

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

Latest News of the Work of the State Legislature Condensed for the Busy Reader

St. Paul—Action to widen the authority of Minnesota city governments in dealing with unemployment was urged before the public welfare committee of the lower house by Governor Floyd B. Olson and representatives of the three large cities. In a crowded committee room the governor begged the lawmakers to expedite his proposals, embraced in seven legislative measures drafted by men closely linked with poor relief work. He was supported in his pleadings by Mayors William A. Anderson of Minneapolis and William Mahoney of St. Paul, and by Emil Gustafson, Duluth city commissioner. All urged the committee to act favorably on the one proposal they considered most important—that broadening the bonding powers of municipalities. It would permit such governmental subdivisions to issue poor relief bonds without limits and without approval of the people.

The statewide boxing bill passed the senate by a vote of 41 to 15, after running a gauntlet of amendments successfully. As all amendments were beaten, the bill as passed by the lower house now goes to Governor Floyd B. Olson for his approval. Victory ends a four year campaign by the American Legion to extend legalized boxing, now permitted only in the three large cities, to the smaller cities of the state with a 15-round limit instead of ten.

Repeal of the Minnesota prohibition enforcement act was approved by the house of representatives in a preliminary consideration of proposals to wipe dry laws off the statute books. Obviously wet in its leanings from the start, the house gave half-hearted attention to the pleadings of dry members and when it came time for a vote, decided, 68 to 9, to adopt a temperance committee report recommending the repeal. It was sent to the senate.

Instead of repealing the one mill road tax, the house committee on public highways proposes to hand the proceeds of this tax over to county commissioners to spend on roads as they see fit. Passage of this bill would mean that $1,700,000 a year paid in direct taxation and spent under state supervision on state aid roads, would be distributed according to the judgment of 87 county boards for use on state aid roads or county aid roads, as the county fathers see fit.

Abolition of the state system of county agricultural agents which cost the state $86,000 in legislative appropriations, in addition to funds provided by counties and farm bureau associations, is proposed in a bill introduced in the senate by Senator John E. Fearing, St. Paul.

Governor Olson faces rebellion in the ranks of his own party. Senator Emil L. Regnier of Marshall, campaign manager of the farmer-labor party last fall, announced that he will oppose confirmation of Harry E. Boyle of Duluth, named by Governor Olson as a member of the state tax commission.

A public hearing on a bill proposing to restrict the scope of burial insurance companies brought a capacity crowd to the house chamber including morticians from all parts of the state. The hearing was conducted by the house insurance committee. The bill sponsored by Representatives Joseph Kozlak and Dewey Johnson of Minneapolis, would require burial insurance companies to pay claims in cash instead of in funeral services.

Governor Olson signed the "lame duck" bill and it was sent to Washington. Minnesota was the twenty-sixth state to sign for the abolishment of them. Missouri was the thirty-sixth state, which was enough to seal the doom of filibuster meetings of congress. This will become law and instead of new members waiting until March 4 to be inaugurated, they will come into office in January, 43 days earlier.

Power to proceed with statewide investigation of telephone rates is given the railroad and warehouse commission under terms of a bill introduced by Senator George Siegel of St. Paul and Representative Dewey W. Johnson of Minneapolis. The cost of investigation would be assessed against the telephone companies.

Spending $50,000 for free seed for impoverished farmers is proposed in a bill by three northern Minnesota representatives. It would turn the job over to the state commissioner of agriculture, acting with approval of the executive council.

Officials of the state game and fish department and of sportsmen's organizations declared they were opposed to a bill offered by Representative John Coughlin, Faribault, under which 45 per cent of fishing license fees would be turned over to the counties in which they are collected.

Proposals for a slash in automobile taxes for this year precipitated a dispute between Secretary of State Mike Holm and Highway Commissioner N. W. Elsberg over financial needs of the state highway department. Appearing before the house motor vehicles committee, Elsberg warned that the 50 per cent slash approved recently by the senate motor vehicles committee would wreck development plans of the department. No new roads could be added, he said, nor could the three large cities expect a portion of the highway fund for upkeep of streets designated as trunk highways. Holm, however, stepped forth with a series of figures setting out that the proposed 50 per cent slash would in no way impair the highway department. He claimed it would leave it more than $6,000,000 for new construction after all other needs had been financed. The 50 per cent slash, he asserted, would mean but a $3,000,000 reduction in the highway income.

The committee voted out favorably, Senator A. J. Rockne's proposal to collect $2,768,000 from the state highway fund to reimburse the state revenue fund for expenditures in collecting automobile taxes. Senator Rockne's proposal was amended by the committee to spread the payments over an eight-year period.

The finance committee took first steps to comply with a resolution proposing a study of the state teachers college system to determine whether part of the equipment might be utilized to house state wards. The resolution, presented by Senator Charles N. Orr, St. Paul, emphasized the growing needs of the state board of control and the cost of sponsoring the teachers colleges, which the resolution states, compete with privately endowed institutions.

State aid for teachers training departments and all Minnesota high schools would be discontinued and the departments abolished under a bill introduced in the house by Representatives H. L. Wahlstrand of Willmar, William F. Ost, New York Mills, and 13 others. Passage of the measure would mean a saving of upwards of $250,000 to the state, Wahlstrand said. It would effect a cut of about $2,000 for each of 83 schools now receiving state aid for their teachers' training department.

Heartened by the success of seeing one primary election change passed by the house, Representative Mark Nolan, Gilbert, reintroduced his bill to change the date of state primaries from June to September. Although that proposal and another, to provide for party designation of all primary election candidates, previously had been killed, the house approved Nolan's measure for a consolidated party ballot at the primaries. The bill provides for printing the names of all candidates on one ballot, but grouping them by parties with the ballot to become void if the elector votes for candidates of more than one party.

A bill to control roadside industries as part of the state highway roadside beautification program was introduced in the senate by Senator Herman Schmechel of Fairfax. No buildings could be erected closer than 85 feet from the center line of a highway; filling stations would be allowed within 35 feet of highways, while signs would have to be erected 50 feet from roads. At grade crossings, all structures would be prohibited within 250 feet of a highway.

Every employee would be given a written contract when he takes a job; employees must be paid in legal tender; garnishment provisions would be changed to provide greater protection to the worker, and other measures to benefit employees would be set up under terms of a series of bills introduced with the backing of the state industrial commission. Labor members from the Twin Cities are sponsoring the bills, with the aid of the Minnesota Federation of Labor, but they represent the views of the industrial commission. They said it is the first time the commission has made recommendations on bills of this sort.

The drivers' license bill and the driver's responsibility bill, sponsored by the State Automobile Association and safety groups of the state, has been introduced and is in the hands of committees. Drivers would pay an annual license fee of 25 cents and power would be given the highway commissioner to revoke licenses after serious violations of traffic laws. Representative Ray J. Quinlivan of St. Cloud is sponsoring the bill in the house.

Creation of a wild life refuge in Marshall county, similar to the Red Lake refuge was proposed to the house by Representative F. A. Green of Stephen. His bill would provide that the state take over 180,000 acres upon which ditch taxes are delinquent. The bill involves 18 townships against which $1,000,000 in ditch bonds are outstanding. These bonds, Green's bill proposes, would be retired by issuing state certificates of indebtedness.

The Twin Cities will become a part of a metropolitan running horse circuit if a pari-mutuel racing bill is passed by the present session.

Representative S. A. Stockwell's bill, calling for a vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to permit exchange of state lands for federal lands in Minnesota, was sent to the senate after passage by the house, 97 to 16. The measure would permit consolidation of the state's holdings and ultimate developments for forestry or other uses.

FIND PROVES TRUTH OF ANCIENT STORY

Writer Hails the Discovery of Sibyl's Grotto.

The discovery described by our Rome correspondent of the authentic grotto of the sibyl in Cumae of Campania is one of the most dramatic of recent confirmations of ancient legend by modern archeology. We boast our fund of ascertained knowledge, the hard, clear outlines of the little world of today. And doubtless it is no bad thing to have clear outlines most of the time. But something humanely skeptical remains in all of us, which is perhaps why we are pleased when we are shown that myth is not so mythical as it looked nor ancient story quite so unhistorical as we had thought it. And the legend of the sibyl of Cumae, to which pick and shovel have now given a verified local habitation, is a very old and famous story. Before Rome was, the inhabitants of this most ancient of Greek colonies in Italy were pursuing the cult of Apollo; well before the end of the Fifth century before Christ the citizens of the future lord of the ancient world were sending messengers to consult the oracle in rock-girt Cumae. Centuries later, when to Romans the founding of Rome was already a pious legend, Vergil imagined and set down for all time in gravely moving hexamters his hero, taking guidance of the mysterious prophetess before seeking his destined city. But was it only imaginary? The details of the newly discovered chamber seem to tally so closely with the description in the Eneid that it is hard to believe that Vergil had not seen the place. Be that as it may, before long the knowledge of its site was lost, as it seemed for good, and the grotto of the sibyl slipped out of the lives and thoughts of men until, nineteen centuries after, a learned man of a later Rome was walking through the vineyards on an autumn day and came upon a rock wine cellar of "curiously harmonious" design. This cellar, Professor Maiuri believes, was the actual chamber of the sibyl. From the cave of the oracle to wine cellar: it is a strange transition, but perhaps not an entirely inappropriate one.—Manchester (Eng.) Guardian.

THEY HAVE FOUND A 3-MINUTE WAY TO RELIEVE SORE THROAT

All Pain And Soreness Eased In Few Minutes This Simple Way

GARGLE Thoroughly—Throw Your Head Way Back, Allowing a Little to Trickle Down Your Throat.

Proves Only Medicine Helps A Sore Throat

Modern medical science now throws an entirely new light on sore throat. A way that eases the pain, rawness and irritation in as little as two or three minutes.

Results are among the most extraordinary in medical science. On doctors' advice, millions are following this way . . . discarding old-time "washes" and "antiseptics." For it has been found that only medicine can help a sore throat.

Simple To Do. All you do is crush and dissolve three BAYER Aspirin Tablets in half a glass of water. Gargle with it twice—as pictured above. If you have any indication of a cold—before gargling take 2 Bayer Aspirin Tablets with a full glass of water. This is to combat any signs of cold that have gone into your system. Keep on taking if cold has a "hold." For Genuine Bayer Aspirin will not harm you. Your doctor will tell you, it does not depress the heart. Get a box of 12 or a bottle of 100 at any drug store.

Reduces Infection, Eases Pain Instantly. Gargling with Bayer Aspirin will do three things: Relieve soreness at once. Allay inflammation. AND—reduce infection; which is the important thing in fighting a sore throat.

It requires medicine—like BAYER ASPIRIN—to do these things! That is why throat specialists throughout America are prescribing this BAYER gargle in place of old-time ways. Results are quick and amazing.

Be careful, however, that you get real BAYER Aspirin Tablets for this purpose. For they dissolve completely enough to gargle without leaving irritating particles. Watch this when you buy.

IDEAL CHRISTIAN SCHOOL

The Christian institute in Castro, Parama, Brazil, is a type of school which is economical, efficient, thoroughly Christian. Teachers and pupils live, work and study together as one family. The schools are located on farms of from 600 to 11,000 acres, and all the work is done by the students. They are not "educated away" from rural conditions, but are trained to Christianize all the relationships of life. A number of former pupils are now directing schools in the interior, helping to reduce the estimated 75 per cent illiteracy.

—1—

"I've swallowed," said Philip Starr to himself, "about two bushels of dust. Don't they ever oil their roads in Vermont, I wonder? I'm sure I can't make Burlington tonight anyway—it must be somewhere over on the other side of the map."

He interrupted his own train of thought by laughing aloud, and brought his motor to a stop beside the powdery highway which he had been mentally condemning.

"Irish, cropping out as usual," he said, grinning, as he locked the car, "or maybe I'm still dippy—typhoid bugs die hard. Anyway, I'm going to see if this brook doesn't wind far enough from the road somewhere soon for me to get into it, without being arrested in the process."

He rolled under the barbed-wire fence, and scrambled into the underbrush of the woods that skirted the road.

He was right; the little brook, twisting and turning, wound farther and farther into the woods; it foamed into a tiny waterfall, widened to a small pool, ideal for a swim! But, pulling off his coat and jerking at his collar, the man stopped short and stared ahead of him, wondering if he were suddenly losing his senses.

On the edge of the pool, just beyond the waterfall, was a girl, her face turned from him, her white feet and ankles gleaming through the clear water of the brook. She had on a soft, short, close-fitting white garment, and her bare arms were raised above her head, half-covered with the masses of shining hair that fell about her like a golden cloud.

Philip had been whistling. He stopped abruptly. The girl shook her hair, dropped her arms, and turned around. Then after one startled second, in which Philip saw that her eyes were as blue as the shining sky which dappled the woods with its light, she smiled with entire friendliness.

"How do you do?" she asked pleasantly.

"I'm very well—that is, I'm not well at all. I've just had typhoid fever." Philip stammered. Then, thinking what an asinine thing that was to say, he went on, realizing all the time that he was not becoming less asinine. "That's why I'm here—trying to get better, you know."

"I see," said the girl, with the same serene pleasantness. "I'm sorry. Did you walk all the way from wherever you came?"

Philip laughed. "No, I motored. I left Boston early this morning, but I got so tired and so dirty and so hot that I—"

"Left your motor by the side of the road, and followed the brook to take a swim. And now I'm here first, spoiling it all. What a pity! I'll go—"

"Oh, please don't! I don't think you're spoiling anything particularly," Philip stammered again. "In fact you—you rather add—to the place—and I thought it was the prettiest place I had ever seen, anyway."

The girl put up her hands, and began drying her hair again. "Won't you sit down?" she asked. "You must be pretty tired."

Philip complied with this suggestion, feeling it to be an agreeable one, and, utterly at a loss as to what to say or do next, waited for the girl to make the next move. At last, as she continued to dry her hair in silence, he burst out, "Is one apt to run across—persons—like you—beside Vermont brooks? Perhaps you're not a person at all? Perhaps you're a dryad—or a nymph—or something like that?"

"I wish I were," she said, and the least shadow of discontent seemed to have crept into her voice. "I don't remember much about dryads and nymphs. My cousin Mary knows all about them. She'd have her nose in a book half the time, if she didn't have so much else to do. She and mother and Cousin Jane are all housecleaning today—that's why I ran away. I'd have had to help if I'd stayed at home. You'd never believe there was so much in a house, until you got it all out in the front yard! And Paul is so lazy he never helps half as much as he might, and Mary has to stop right in the middle of everything and chase up the children, and Cousin Jane goes off to prayer meeting—and oh, it's all plenty bad enough to make anyone want to be a nymph and live in a brook, where life is just one perpetual bath, and there can't possibly be anything to houseclean!"

"Well, if you're not a nymph, and you don't live in a brook, would you think I were awfully rude if I asked what your name is and where you live?"

"My name is Blanche Manning. I live on Lady Blanche farm."

"Lady Blanche farm!" echoed Philip. "What a pretty name!"

"Yes—there's quite a pretty story about it, too. Would you like to hear it?"

"Very much."

"All right—my hair's dry now. I'll go and dress and you can have your swim. I've got some lunch with me—where my clothes are—enough for two, I guess. I'll come back."

It was more than half an hour later before he heard her returning. He had bathed and dressed hurriedly, and was sitting, greatly refreshed and tremendously hungry, but growing extremely anxious to have her return. At last she called:

"Hoo-oo-oo."

"Hoo-oo," he answered.

"What's your name?"

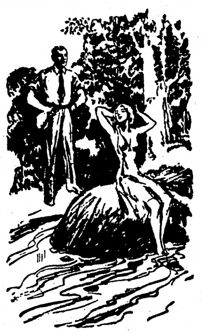
"Philip Starr."

"Well, Mr. Philip Starr, is it all right for me to come?"

"Yes, I've been ready ages. Do hurry."

She reappeared, still all in white. She did not, he noticed quickly, look very different now than when in the white bathing suit—of course he had by this time realized that this was what the slip had been. She stopped on the bank, a forgotten difficulty suddenly occurring to her.

"We're on opposite sides. We'll have to walk up a little way. There's a shallow place where I can get across on the stones."



Philip Had Been Whistling. He Stopped Abruptly.

"I guess you've run away before. You seem to know the lay of the land pretty well."

"Oh, yes. Cousin Jane thinks mother has let Paul and me both grow up awful shirkers. Only he just loafs, and I run."

"I see. Well, I'm surely glad you ran this time. Is Paul your brother?"

"Yes. He's twenty—the same age as my cousin Mary. They're sort of half engaged. He's fond of her, but not nearly as fond of her as she is of him. He likes to have a good time with other girls, too, and, for all Mary can see, there isn't another boy in the world except Paul. He's perfectly sure of her, and it makes him careless. I shouldn't like to be engaged that way."

"Don't worry, you won't be. How old are you?"

"Seventeen. It's a nice age."

"It certainly is. Are you going to be seventeen long?"

"Almost a year."

Philip Starr could not remember when he had laughed so often. He leapt across the stepping stones, and took the box of lunch from Blanche.

"I meant to come over on your side."

"Of course. But I meant to help you across."

"I hadn't thought of that."

"Well, I had," said Philip abruptly. "I've been thinking of it for some minutes. It's a very pleasant thought to dwell on."

She looked at him with the same slightly startled expression as when she had first discovered him, but it faded again just as quickly. She put out both her hands and he swung her lightly across, so easily that she could hardly believe she was over.

For some minutes they ate in satisfied silence. "Do you mind if I smoke," Philip asked, when the last delicious crumb was gone, "while you tell me that story—about Lady Blanche farm, you know?"

"Oh, yes—have you ever been in the Connecticut valley before?"

"I'm sorry to say I haven't."

"Well, it was mostly settled—around Hamstead, anyway—by men who came up the river from Massachusetts, not long before the Revolution. We all belong to the Daughters of the American Revolution," she interrupted herself with a touch of pride. "They nearly all had big farms, and built big houses, and prospered; then they married each other's children, and have kept on living here ever since—the descendants have, I mean. We're nearly all cousins—third or fourth or fifth—in Hamstead. It would be pleasant if it weren't so deadly dull. Once in a long time we have a picnic or a dance, or go to the movies in Wallacetown. That's about all, and always the same people—nice but tedious. That's why it's such a tremendous relief to meet someone I don't know at all."

Philip laughed, aware that he was feeling strangely warm and comfortable inside at the inference that she might be having illusions or thrills about him.

"Thank you—where does Lady Blanche come in?"

"Oh, she came in right after the Revolution. My great-great-grandfather, Col. Moses Manning, was a friend of Lafayette's. He went back to France with Lafayette, to visit him, and be presented at court. Lady Blanche was a countess who lived on the next estate. She was very young and lovely and sweet, and he fell in love with her."

"Peculiar man, wasn't he?" murmured Philip.

"Do you think so? Oh, you're laughing at me! You think I am awfully silly and countrified and—"

"You precious kid!" exclaimed Philip, sitting bolt upright in alarm; and then, as the startled look came into the blue eyes again, he went on very quickly and gently, "Excuse me. I didn't mean to be rude—or fresh. But I've been pretty sick, and it's a long time since I have laughed, or felt able to laugh. Please go on about the little French countess. Did she fall in love with him, too?"

"Such things do happen."

"Yes, I suppose so," said the present Blanche, a trifle hurriedly, "—once in a great while, and ever so long ago, of course. So they were married, although her family wasn't very enthusiastic about her going across the sea to an unknown wilderness—but as all the rest of them were guillotined not long after, she was better off than they were, anyway. Of course Colonel Moses brought her to Hamstead to live. She had a fortune in her own right, and a wonderful trousseau—great boxes and chests of linen and lace and clothes and silver and jewels and books, and she had furniture sent, too, from the chateau. And my great-great-grandfather built her a big brick house—the handsomest one anywhere around here—and—"

"It's a lovely story. What happened next?"

"The rest of it isn't so lovely. It's rather sad. The other farmers' wives in Hamstead didn't care for Lady Blanche. I think they were a little jealous of her because she was so much richer and more beautiful than they were, and she couldn't talk English well enough to make them understand that she wasn't haughty and cold, as they thought, but just as gentle and lonely and anxious to be friendly as she could be. And—for a long time, she didn't have any children. That was considered almost a disgrace, in those days, it seems!"

"What was the end of the story?" Philip asked, gently.

"When she had been married about five years, she had twins—a boy and a girl. She wasn't strong, like most of the pioneer women. She died.

"Moses Manning never got over it," Blanche went on, after a long pause. "He didn't marry a second time, the way most of the settlers did, when their wives died—some of them three or four times! And he never called his place anything but Lady Blanche farm, after that—it's never been called anything else, ever since. When the twins, Moses and Blanche, grew up, he built them each a house on his own place, and as the boy wanted to be a lawyer, he built a little office connected with the big brick house, for him. They both married—the children of other pioneers—and had large families, and inherited Lady Blanche's fortune, of course. The houses have never gone out of the family. Mother and Paul and I live in one—the big brick one—and Cousin Jane Manning, who's never married, in another, and Cousin Seth and his children in the third. Of course the fortune's been divided up so many times that it isn't very large any more, but it's enough to make us comfortable, and give us a good education, if we want it. Paul and I didn't 'specially, and Mary, who loves books, had to give up going to boarding school when she was almost ready for college, because her mother died, and there wasn't anyone else to look after her father and the little boys. All the other families in Hamstead have kept on feeling that the Mannings are a little different from the rest of them. We wish they wouldn't—all except mother—I think she rather likes it—but they do! And there's always one Blanche in each generation. There's a queer superstition about that—"

"What is it?"

"Oh, I can't tell you! You'd think it was awfully conceited and—fresh—and—"

"I wouldn't—please—"

But the girl, laughing, shook her head, and got to her feet. "Have you any idea what time it is?" she asked.

"No, I haven't. I don't care what time it is. And I won't tease you to tell me about the superstition now, if you don't want to—that is, if you'll promise to tell me some other time. You—you'll do that, won't you?"

The girl hesitated, and, for the first time, blushed. Then she smiled.

"Where were you thinking of going?" she asked, "before you decided to have a swim and left your motor beside the road?"

"To Burlington, to visit some friends who have a big summer place near there. But I can't get there tonight, now, can I?" he asked, pleading in his voice.

"I don't believe you can, very well. I suppose you're not familiar with the roads?"

"Familiar! I'm not even on speaking terms with them! And there are hardly any guide-posts to introduce us!" he smiled, and, as he did so, he could see the lovely rosy color spreading over the girl's face again. "What's the name of the hotel in Hamstead?" he asked abruptly.

"There isn't any hotel. But probably—it's so late, and you've been ill, and everything—Mary would take you in."

"I don't want to intrude—"

"Mary wouldn't feel that you were intruding. She'll be only too thankful to have the chance to make you comfortable. That is, that's the way I think she'll feel about it. At any rate, we better go down there and see!"

WHEN JOHNNY BULL MADE BAD BARGAIN

Nobody wanted northern Minnesota in the early days of the American Republic. The vast unsettled region of forests and lakes was not claimed by the Continental congress, and would today be a part of Canada, if the British had not outdone the Yankees in the game of give away.

A brochure by W. E. Culkin, of Duluth, on the early history of that region brings out the interesting fact that a British proposal, made following the War of 1812, actually gave the vast iron deposits of Minnesota to the United States, which had laid no claim to territory north of the headwaters of the Mississippi.

Once in early days, says Mr. Culkin, the Continental congress even proposed the forty-ninth parallel of latitude as the boundary line.

Imagine the map of what is now Minnesota, if that line had been adopted in the boundary treaty. The Canadian boundary would have run right through the north side of Minneapolis. The forty-fifth parallel, marked by a boulder on Glenwood parkway near the Nineteenth avenue road crossing, is right on the line of Twentieth avenue north, lower Broadway, and on the line of Broadway east of the river. Everything north of that line would be British, including the cities of Stillwater, Litchfield, Willmar and Madison.

All of Minnesota west of the big river at that time belonged to France. The east side of Minneapolis was British first, then a part of Northwest territory, while the major portion of the city was a French possession. The Louisiana Purchase brought Minnesota, west of the river, into the United States. But that was in 1803. The northern boundary between the United States and Canada had not been determined then.

When the Rush-Bagot treaty was made, following the War of 1812, the American commissioners were surprised at the generous offer made by their British colleagues. The British proposed that the line run through Lake Superior, "northward of the Isles Royale and Philippeaux to the Long lake; thence through the middle of Long lake, and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the most northwestern part thereof."

That describes what is today a large part of Minnesota's north boundary, running through the chain of lakes ending with Rainy lake, then by Rainy lake to Lake of the Woods.

The Louisiana Purchase ran only to the headwaters of the Mississippi. Evidently, American commissioners would have accepted a line drawn through the head waters, east and west, as the boundary line, but the generous Englishmen fairly tossed a third of Minnesota's present area into their laps. With it we received the princely heritage of the iron deposits.

What a wealth of minerals and timber, what a vacation paradise, would have been lost to this country and to the state of Minnesota, if the early ideas of American statesmen had been carried into the boundary line treaty!—Minneapolis Journal.

GIRLS ON THE BORDERLINE OF WOMANHOOD

YOUNG girls or women need not suffer month after month with periodic pains, nor should one suffer from catarrhal drains ("whites") or bearing-down pains. This is the experience of Mrs. C. W. Avey of 321 So. 27th St., Billings, Mont.: "When I was a school girl developing into womanhood, skipping rope caused me to have severe cramps, pains in back and limbs and terrible headaches. Before I had finished one bottle of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription I felt so well and strong that I had no more of this suffering, and I never since have had any such trouble."

Mother of 7—Still Young

Her system doesn't stagnate; her face doesn't age. She has the health and "pep" that come from a lively liver and strong, active bowels.

When you're sluggish and the system needs help, don't take a lot of "patent medicines." There's a famous doctor's prescription for just such cases, and every druggist keeps this standard preparation. It is made from fresh laxative herbs, active senna, and pure pepsin. Just ask for Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin. Take a little every day or so, until every organ in your body feels the big improvement.

The next time you have a bilious headache, or feel all bound-up, take this delicious syrup instead of the usual cathartic. You'll be rid of all that poisonous waste, and you haven't weakened the bowels. You'll have a better appetite, and feel better in every way. The constant use of cathartics is often the cause of a sallow complexion and lines in the face. And so unnecessary!

Would you like to break yourself of the cathartic habit? At the same time building health and vigor that protects you from frequent sick spells, headaches, and colds? Get a big bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin today. Use often enough to avoid those attacks of constipation. When you feel weak and run-down or a coated tongue or bad breath warns you the bowels need to be stimulated. Give it to children instead of strong laxatives that sap their strength. It isn't expensive.

Livestock Shipping Assn. Held Their Annual Meeting

The members of the Holt Farmers Co-operative Livestock Shipping Assn. held their annual meeting here on Monday, Jan. 30. Eighteen farmer members of the association come in to hear the annual reports and to elect two new directors.

J. P. Benitt was re-elected to serve on the board and O. J. Backlund was elected to take the place of Harvey Copp of Excell.

The association shipped out twenty-five carloads of mixed stock the past year carrying 1733 head of livestock. These shipments included 553 head of cattle, 201 hogs, and 979 sheep.

The gross sales of the stock at South Saint Paul amounted to $14,799.83. Out of this amount the farmers here were paid $11,410.32, and the remaining $3,389.51 was spent for freight haul, yard expenses at St. Paul, the commission paid to the local manager of the association, and $51.97 which is left in the sinking fund.

In 1931 the association shipped 40 cars of stock and the farmers here received $26,627.85. The reason for less cars being shipped this year is due to the fact that some farmers have shipped with the Rosewood Shipping Assn. and others have had theirs trucked to Fargo. We believe that more stock was sold here in 1932 than in 1931.

Cox Suspended

W. T. Cox, head of the state conservation department for two years, was suspended Saturday by the Minnesota conservation commission, effective at once. He will have a hearing next month and the right of appeal to the courts if permanently ousted. E. V. Willard, in charge of the division of drainage and waters, was elected acting commissioner.

The suspension came after W. E. McEwen of Duluth, commission chairman, introduced a resolution charging Cox with inefficiency, lack of executive ability and failure to co-operate. Cox denied the allegation.

Audrey Irene Sorenson

Funeral services were conducted here last Thursday afternoon from the Free Mission church for Audrey Irene Sorenson, the oldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Carl Sorenson. Audrey passed away at her home here Sunday, Feb. 5 after an illness of many months duration.

Audrey Irene Sorenson was born in Newfolden, Minn. Mar. 21, 1915, and was at the time of her death 17 year 10 months and 14 days of age. Left to mourn her departure are her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Sorenson, two brothers, Stanley and Lester and two sisters, Lenora and Ruth.

Rev. Myhrer and P. P. Reierson officiated and interment was made in the family lot at the Holt cemetery.

Card of Thanks

We wish to express our heartfelt thanks to our friends and neighbors for their kindness and sympathy during the illness and death of our beloved daughter and sister. We also thank Rev. Myhrer for his comforting words and those who brought flowers.

Suggests County Poor Farm

Investigation into the feasibilities of operating a county poor farm for Marshall county is now under way following a recent meeting of the county board of commissioners, according to S. S. Easter, county poor relief administrator.

The investigation is now under way and every possible plan will be considered, said Mr. Easter. We want to administer relief to the needy and poor at the lowest cost for efficient operation, so are studying all possible plans for future action.

The last meeting of the commissioners was devoted mainly towards the discussion of the county poor situation, the entire burden of relief being left in the hands of the county following the choice of the electorate at fall's election.

Much relief work is being done in all sections of the county under Mr. Easter's direction. The work relief is being done by able bodied men who are without employment and who have made applications for funds to carry them thru the winter. The work relief plan is meeting with much favor as it provides those who are able with an opportunity to earn the necessities rather than a direct dole.

Needed work is being done in all parts of the county. The work consists of clearing out river bottoms of brush and trees, cutting wood, cleaning roadsides of brush, opening highways from snow, and etc.—Sheaf.

Death of Mrs. Stokke

Mrs. Anton Stokke of Newfolden township passed away at her home on Monday evening after an illness of several weeks from pneumonia. She was 80 years old and was one of the early pioneers of this country.

Left to mourn her departure are her husband and four daughters, Mrs. A. Holmaas, Mrs. O. Tollefsrud of Newfolden, Mrs. J. Engebretson of Grand Forks, and Mrs. Hjalmar Johnson of Holt, and one son, Emil, of Grand Forks. Funeral services were held on Thursday from the country church near their home.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Nelson attended a birthday party for Mrs. Carrie Norby at Thief River Falls Tuesday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Victor Johnson spent last Thursday in Thief River were the assisted with the removal to the St. Lukes hospital of Mrs. Johnson's mother, Mrs. K. Nyberg, who was very ill. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson were down to see her yesterday.

Nils Swanson

Nils Swanson, 80 years old, who has been making his home here with Mr. and Mrs. Albert Bennes the past eighteen years, passed away at their home here Wednesday morning after an illness which has kept him in bed for several weeks.

Funeral services will be conducted from the Free Mission church here next Wednesday at 1 p m. The remains will then be taken to Erskine for burial

Mr. Swanson leaves two sons, Nils of Portland, Oregon and Alfred of Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, and one daughter, Mrs. Albert Bennes of Holt. His wife died about twenty years ago and one daughter, Mrs. Peterson of Fertile died ten years ago.

Christian Ring

Christian L. Ring, a pioneer of this community for the past 30 years, passed away at the home of his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Erickson, on Wednesday morning, at the age of 80 years.

He is survived by his aged wife and two sons, Lars, of Alexandria, Minn., Axel, of Bedford, Iowa, and two daughters, Mrs. Oscar Hanson of Mahnomen and Mrs. Frank Erickson of Holt.

Funeral services will be held here on Monday at 2 p. m. from the Nazareth Lutheran church.

Thelma Joyce Larson

The angel of death crept into the home of Mr. and Mrs. Iver Larson on Tuesday evening and claimed their little ten months old daughter, Thelma Joyce.

The little baby girl had been ill for about five days with pneumonia and on Monday afternoon was removed to the Physicians Hospital in Thief River Falls, where she passed away at 5 p.m. on Tuesday after much suffering from the illness.

Funeral services will be held from the Nazareth Lutheran church here on Saturday at 1 p.m.

Mrs. J. Hagberg is spending the week with relatives in Thief River.

SYNOPSIS

Motoring through Vermont, near the village of Hamstead, Philip Starr, young Boston architect, meets, in unconventional fashion, Blanche Manning, girl of seventeen, with whom he is immediately enamored. In conversation, he learns something of her family history. Starr is convalescing from a serious illness, and it being a long distance to Burlington, his destination, Blanche suggests, the small village not boasting a hotel, that he become, for the night, a guest of her cousin, Mary Manning.

Lady Blanche farm lay a mile or so south of Hamstead, stretching on one side of the road back to the foothills of the Green mountains, and on the other, in broad, sweeping meadows, straight down to the Connecticut river. Two big houses, one of brick, with a small, semi-detached brick building—the lawyer Moses' office—the other of wood, white-painted and white-pillared, with a large flower garden, stood on it. Across the road was a smaller house, brick with a wooden ell, less true to line, and decidedly less prosperous in appearance.

As they came in sight of all this Philip Starr brought his motor to an abrupt stop, and turned to Blanche, who had unhesitatingly accepted his invitation to "help him find the farm," by riding back with him.

"Is that where you live?"

"Yes, the big brick house is ours. The big white one is Cousin Jane's. The one across the way is where Mary lives."

"Good Lord!"

"What's the matter?"

"Matter! It's the most beautiful place I ever saw in my life. I didn't tell you, did I—I'm an architect. I mean, that's my regular job. But on the side, I can't help dabbling in other things—sketching, modeling, carving—I was four years in Europe while I was growing up, and went back to Paris for a course at the Beaux Arts after I got through Harvard. And I've never—" his eyes turned from the landscape and swept over the face and figure of the girl beside him—"seen the Elysian fields and one of the nymphs before!"

"It's pretty, but I don't see why you should think it's so remarkable. And it's so deadly dull!—Perhaps we had better hurry a little, or Mary may be through supper."

They stopped beside the least pretentious of the three houses, and walked up the cobblestone path. Here, on the huge granite slab that formed the front doorstep, sat a small boy, who was engaged in eating an enormous piece of lemon pie with his fingers.

"Hello, Moses," said Blanche. "Where's Mary?"

"She's putting Algernon to bed," replied the small boy.

"Algernon!" exclaimed Philip, involuntarily.

"Yes," interposed Blanche, a trifle impatiently, "Cousin Laura—his mother, you know, that died—said she was so tired of the same old family names, that when he came along, she felt she'd simply got to have a change. She found that in a book called 'The Wicked Duke'; Algernon was the duke. It wasn't allowed in the Hamstead library, but it was a great story, just the same. Come in, Mr. Starr, and I'll call Mary, Mary—!—M-A-R-Y—"

"Yes," floated down a voice from the upper story. "Coming, honey. Did you have a good time?"

"Yes, lovely. Hurry up—we've got company."

A door opened and shut quickly, there was the sound of swift footsteps coming across a hall, and a girl, with another golden-haired child—presumably the namesake of the wicked duke—in her arms, appeared at the head of the stairs. In a flash, Philip remembered and understood the quick resentment Blanche had shown when he asked her if her cousin were plain. For if Blanche were lovely, Mary was certainly beautiful, with the tall, superbly formed, quiet beauty of a Greek statue. And yet, it was not of a Greek statue that he almost instantly thought. The blue cotton dress that she had on, dulled and faded from frequent washing, had turned to the soft color in which the painters of the Middle ages loved to clothe their Madonnas; the little boy, apparently snatched from his bath to answer Blanche's summons, was cuddled, pink and plump and sturdy against her shoulder. Mary! The coincidence of the name, too, seemed almost startling. What sort of a man could the indifferent Paul be, he wondered. The younger girl's explanation of his presence broke in upon his silent admiration.

"This is Mr. Philip Starr of Boston, Mary. I met him by the brook. He's an architect. He's been sick with typhoid fever, and is on his way to Burlington in a motor to make a visit while he's getting strong, but he got lost. I told him I was sure you'd take him in for the night."

"I'm afraid I'm dreadfully intrusive," interrupted Philip, smiling up at Mary, but she in turn interrupted him.

"Of course not. Father and I'll both be awfully glad to have you. Will you put your motor in the shed while I get Algy tucked in? Blanche will take you. I'll be back in a minute, and show you where the guest-chamber and bathroom are."

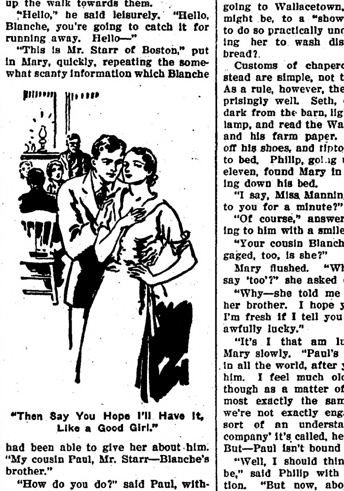
She was already downstairs when they returned from the shed, bending over the guilty but contented Moses.

"I'm afraid you won't have any dessert for supper," she said, laughing. "Moses seems to have cleaned out the pantry while I was busy with Algy. But I can open a jar of preserves, and there are cookies. You go upstairs and turn on the water, Moses. I'll be there in just a minute—Hello, Paul!"

Her voice, soft already, softened perceptibly at the last words. Philip, turning quickly, saw a boy who seemed to be simply a larger and masculine replica of Blanche—there was an almost astonishing family resemblance between all these Mannings!—coming up the walk towards them.

"Hello," he said leisurely. "Hello, Blanche, you're going to catch it for running away. Hello—"

"This is Mr. Starr of Boston," put in Mary, quickly, repeating the somewhat scanty information which Blanche had been able to give her about him. "My cousin Paul, Mr. Starr—Blanche's brother."



"Then Say You Hope I'll Have It, Like a Good Girl."

"How do you do?" said Paul, without much enthusiasm. "Glad to see you—Mother's gone to bed with a sick headache—all used up after cleaning the North parlor. So I thought I better come over here for supper."

"Of course," agreed Mary warmly. "Will you show Mr. Starr where to go while I get Moses settled? Come, Moses."

She disappeared up the stairs again. Philip picked up his bag, which Paul had made no effort to take from him, and followed. Little as he knew of the customs of New England farmers, he thought it unlikely that there were many who looked like this one, or who were at leisure to appear in white flannels at six o'clock on a May evening. He resented both the boy's beauty and his clothes. Paul stopped at the open door of a small room and motioned him to enter.

"I hope you'll find this fairly decent," he said, depreciatingly. "Mary's not much of a housekeeper—there's probably some dust about. That's the bathroom at the end of the hall—there's only one."

"Thanks—have I time for a shave before supper?"

"I guess so—Mary'll wait for you anyway."

The family was waiting for him when he went downstairs again. Blanche had gone home and changed her dress for another white one, softer and filmier than the one she had worn in the afternoon. Mary, apparently, had had no time to freshen up, and had simply tied a crisp apron of generous proportions over the faded blue gingham; while a tired-looking, elderly man, without a necktie and with a shabby coat slipped on over his khaki shirt and trousers, came forward to welcome Philip.

"Pleased to meet you," he said with the same unquestioning cordiality that Mary had shown. "Blanche has been tellin' us how she happened to find you and that you've been sick. I'm real sorry, but I guess our good Vermont air'll fix you up. Come and set down to supper. It's all ready—such as 'tis. I understand Moses has et up a good share of it."

There was, however, no scarcity of supper. There was, on the contrary, a good deal of it—two big slices of ham, with a quantity of clear, golden-brown gravy, fried eggs, baked potatoes, dandelion greens. Philip thought he had never been so hungry, that nothing had ever tasted so good—

"Want to smoke?" asked Paul at his elbow as they rose from the table.

Philip hesitated. He had not visited in many families where "they did their own work" but he had a vague feeling that he ought to offer to be useful.

"Don't we help with the dishes first?" he asked.

"Mercy, don't you think of such a thing!" Seth exclaimed. "Mary'll have 'em done in no time, while I finish milkin'. You and Blanche and Paul go and set on the front porch and take it easy."

"I'm going to Wallacetown, to a show," said Paul briefly.

"Oh, don't tonight!"

Paul turned on his cousin impatiently. "What are you so down on Wallacetown for?" he asked crossly. "I've got all my plans made—I didn't know we were going to have company, did I? I'd have asked you to go with me, of course, only I knew you wouldn't care for it anyway, even if you weren't too busy—it'll be nine o'clock before you get the dishes done and the bread set." Then, seeing that Mary's face was still clouded, he added, more pleasantly and very persuasively, "Mary—you like me to have a good time, once in a while, don't you?"

"Of course I do. But—"

"Then say you hope I'll have it, like a good girl."

He slipped his arm around her, rubbing his head against hers, and kissing her cheek. She smiled and returned his kiss.

"All right, run along," she said cheerfully. "Blanche, you can keep Mr. Starr amused, can't you?"

"Of course she can," said Philip hastily. But he stood still, looking at Mary with a slightly puzzled expression. Was it possible that Paul—engaged—he had the boy's sister's word for it—to this wonderful creature, was going to Wallacetown, wherever that might be, to a "show," his privilege to do so practically unquestioned, leaving her to wash dishes and make bread?

Customs of chaperonage in Hamstead are simple, not to say primitive. As a rule, however, they work out surprisingly well. Seth, coming in after dark from the barn, lighted the kitchen lamp, and read the Wallacetown Bugle and his farm paper. Then he took off his shoes, and tiptoed up the stairs to bed. Philip, going up to bed about eleven, found Mary in his room, turning down his bed.

"I say, Miss Manning—may I speak to you for a minute?"

"Of course," answered Mary, turning to him with a smile. "What is it?"

"Your cousin Blanche—she isn't engaged, too, is she?"

Mary flushed. "What makes you say 'too'?" she asked quietly.

"Why—she told me about you and her brother. I hope you won't think I'm fresh if I tell you I consider him awfully lucky."

"It's I that am lucky," returned Mary slowly. "Paul's the dearest boy in all the world, after you get to know him. I feel much older than he is, though as a matter of fact, we're almost exactly the same age. But—we're not exactly engaged. We've a sort of an understanding—'keeping company' it's called, here in Hamstead. But—Paul isn't bound at all."

"Well, I should think he'd want to be," said Philip with visible admiration. "But now, about his sister? Has she got an 'understanding' or anything awkward like that with anybody?"

"No," said Mary, smiling. "She's very young yet, you know—barely seventeen. Why?"

"Because," Philip burst out, "I've fallen in love with her—head over heels. Of course I haven't told her so yet. But I think she's the loveliest—the most exquisite—oh, the—"

"Yes, I know," said Mary. "So you want—?"

"I'm twenty-four years old, and I'm a fairly decent sort," went on Philip, plunging as usual straight to his point. "I haven't any ancestral home like this—in fact, one of my ancestors was an Irish immigrant, and all of my family were very plain people—there weren't any town histories written about them! But we've always been honest, as far as I know, and we've prospered and risen in the world. I've lots of friends. I've inherited some money, and I'm earning more. I've got a pretty good job, for my age. I'm in Davis and Hamlin's office—"

"Gale Hamlin, the architect?"

"Why, yes! Do you know him?"

"I've—I've met him. His niece, Hannah Adams, was one of my classmates at boarding school. I used to visit her, sometimes, in Boston. So you are in his office!"

"Yes," said Philip excitedly. "What tremendous luck! He can tell you about me—Blanche's mother and brother, you know—and you, for that matter! And you will help me all you can with Blanche, won't you?"

Mary picked up her lamp. "I don't believe you'll need an awful lot of help with Blanche," she said, whimsically. "But I'll say a few things to Cousin Violet that might make a difference. Good night."

"You are good! And you don't think I'm an awful chump going at things this way?"

"I think you're rather nice," said Mary, still whimsically—"if you must know!"

She was closing the door gently behind her, when Philip pulled it open again.

"Mary," he said, "I may call you Mary, mayn't I—tell me the superstition about Lady Blanche—about all the Blanche Mannings."

"Well," said Mary, hesitating a little, "all the Blanches so far have fallen in love at first sight, and married strangers—and gone away from their own homes to live. Their husbands have adored them, and they've been rich and beautiful and—"

"Is that all of the story?"

"Is there anything," asked Mary, suddenly, "that I could tell you that would make you want her any less? Anything that would make you—afraid to try and get her?"

"Anything in the way of an old superstition, you mean? Good Lord, no!"

"Then," said Mary, "I think that's enough for tonight. And good enough for any night, too, isn't it? Especially for a man who has just said he was in love with Blanche—it ought to make you feel as if the suit were half won already! Good night."

"BAD-TEMPER" FITS NOT LIGHT FAULT

A sixty-year-old dentist who was sought by the police for the murder of a seventy-one-year-old woman patient, killed himself to avoid punishment for the crime.

In a note written before ending his life he explained the murder in this way:

"This woman worried me for a year. Made me fix her teeth over four times. Paid a part at the start, then said she did not want them and I must pay back her money and all her carfare. I became mad, choked her. I became wild—you know the rest."

A man of sixty, successful in his profession, respected in his community, to murder a woman because she got him "mad." Though we all know the feeling, it seems hardly conceivable that a civilized, mature man should do such a thing. And yet except for his age and his standing in the community, there are plenty of precedents for murdering in temper.

Temper, lack of self-control, is a blight and a disease which should be guarded against from the cradle. It is a greater danger, a greater threat against the well-being of a civilized community than consumption or cancer. For less people are susceptible to the ravages of those diseases than to attacks of bad temper. And we are less exposed to germs than to provoking people like this woman the doctor killed.

It behooves every mother whose child gives way to fits of bad temper, who condones his indulgence in lack of self-control, to think about this story of the man who paid with murder and his own life because he could not control his temper.

HOW TO STOP A COLD QUICK AS YOU CAUGHT IT

A New Method Doctors Everywhere Are Advising

1 Take 1 or 2 Bayer Aspirin Tablets.

2 Drink Full Glass of Water.

3 If throat is sore, crush and dissolve 3 Bayer Aspirin Tablets in a half glass of warm water and gargle according to directions.

Almost Instant Relief In This Way

If you have a cold—don't take chances with "cold killers" and nostrums. A cold is too dangerous to take chances on.

The simple method pictured above is the way doctors throughout the world now treat colds.

It is recognized as the QUICKEST, safest, surest way. For it will check an ordinary cold almost as fast as you caught it.

That is because the real BAYER Aspirin embodies certain medical qualities that strike at the base of a cold almost INSTANTLY.

You can combat nearly any cold you get simply by taking BAYER Aspirin and drinking plenty of water every 2 to 4 hours the first day and 3 or 4 times daily thereafter. If throat is sore, gargle with 3 BAYER Aspirin Tablets crushed and dissolved in a half glass of warm water, repeating every 2 or 3 hours as necessary. Sore throat eases this way in a few minutes, incredible as this may seem.

Ask your doctor about this. And when you buy, see that you get the real BAYER Aspirin Tablets. They dissolve almost instantly. And thus work almost instantly when you take them. And for a gargle, Genuine Bayer Aspirin Tablets dissolve with sufficient speed and completeness, leaving no irritating particles or grittiness. Get a box of 12 or bottle of 100 at any drug store.

Idea Now Is to Merge Individual Into Mass

There is no longer any other crime than that of being different, any morality other than conformity.

This is, indeed, a kind of intoxication. At first men believed that the new order of things would bring on suffocation and death. Then certain among them discovered that, even if it threatened destruction, it also held out the promise of excitement, it could become a kind of drug.

The revolutionists of the Eighteenth century and their successors, the nineteenth century philosophers, evolved the one new and completely modern pleasure—that of feeling oneself part of a crowd.

All barriers have been leveled. A single absorbing passion seems to have taken possession of all of humanity's great leaders: Napoleon, Kant, Marx, Bismarck, Lenin. It is a passion to transform humanity into a herd as vast and homogeneous, as docile and subservient as possible—and to do so by means of blows, arms, principles and doctrines.

This miserable mass once created, they pound at it with redoubled energy in order to transform living, full-blooded, individual flesh into an inert and brutish substance.—Bernard Fay, in the Forum and Century.

AN AWFUL COUGH! . . AND BACKACHE . .

Davenport, Iowa—"I was afflicted with a terrible cough—would cough myself out of breath, especially at night, and nothing I tried gave me permanent relief. I also had a severe pain in my back which was almost constant, and from this I could get no relief," said Mrs. Violet Loving of 1529 West 6th St. "Finally, I decided to try Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. I took four bottles but before I had taken half that quantity I was well, my cough was all gone and I have had no trouble of the kind since."

MAKES WOMEN LOSE FAT

Miss Rea M. Haines of Dayton, Ohio writes: "I weighed 180 so started to take Kruschen. I never was so surprised as when I weighed myself the first week—I lost 7 pounds. I just bought my 3rd jar and am down to 145—am still taking them and never felt better in my life." (June 17, 1932).

To take off fat—take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen Salts in a glass of hot water in the morning before breakfast—one bottle that lasts 4 weeks costs but a few cents—get it at any drugstore in America. If this first bottle fails to convince you this is the SAFE and harmless way to lose fat—your money gladly returned.

But be sure and get Kruschen Salts—imitations are numerous and you must safeguard your health.

SALADS NEVER "OUT OF SEASON"

©. 1933. Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

The art of salad making knows no season. The skilled salad maker, whether professional or amateur, can make a salad of any time of the year which will be a perfect combination of crisp greens with well-blended seasonings, and with variations, as far as other ingredients go, which will make it original.

In almost every market you will find several salad plants among which or all of which we can choose, says a dietetic authority. In a story in one of our popular magazines a week or two ago the hero always demanded at least three greens in his salad. There is no lovelier salad than a combination of various shades of green in a colorful salad bowl of glass or china. The salad green which is really in season only in winter is, of course, the belgian endive, which is imported in those attractive wicker baskets which you see at the grocer's every time a boat comes over. Its freshness and sweetness is dependent upon the length of time it has been since it left its native shore. It is served in a number of ways. Sometimes the long leaves are separated, sometimes it is cut through the center lengthwise, and occasionally it is cut in small pieces. French dressing or roquefort dressing is usually used with endive—seldom mayonnaise. I had a very attractive salad the other day at a hotel in Chicago. It was made up of two split hearts of endive, on each was arranged alternately slices of avocado and orange. Pimiento was used for the garnish and a french dressing seasoned with orange and lemon juice was served with it.

Iceberg lettuce is the most plentiful salad green and it is usually to be found on the market. Sometimes we get very good romaine.

Celery and that other vegetable of the same type which has an anise flavor and which is often known as Italian celery are other favorite products for salad. Sometimes celery is stuffed with cheese or with a mixture of minced crab and lobster, and used in combination with lettuce for a salad. In this case a small cup of french dressing is served to each person. Stalks of endive are sometimes used this way.

Grapefruit is also used with the various salad plants for a dinner salad. Occasionally a few skinned and seeded grapes and balls of melons are used with it. If this salad is used to serve with the main course french dressing is always used. If, however, you are making your salad and dessert one, a more elaborate combination of fruits with mayonnaise is permissible.

There are two favorite ways of serving a dinner salad. The first is to have a bowl half filled with various greens brought to the table. Sometimes I have as well with this—sliced radishes, sliced tomatoes and rings of sweet onions, or if I can get them, sliced young onions. I like to have one or two minced hard-cooked eggs sprinkled over the greens. Sometimes I add as well a tablespoon or two of minced green or ripe olives or of pickles. I then mix my seasonings, salt, pepper, paprika, sugar and mustard and sprinkle them over the material in the bowl. I next stir in my oil, tossing the leaves and seasonings with a salad fork and spoon. Last of all, I add my vinegar, part of which is tarragon flavor. I have made a trip to the Italian markets and found some fresh tarragon. I use that with the plain vinegar, sometimes white or red wine and sometimes malt. I also stir in a cube of bread, in which a clove of garlic is safely embedded, but take this out after I have mixed my salad, as there should be but a suspicion of this delicious but easily overpowering flavor.

Another favorite way of serving salad is to pass a platter containing hearts of lettuce, romaine and endive, and as the guests help themselves, to offer a bowl of special tomato dressing or of some other dressing of unusual flavor such as "spicy," or "red," or "california," "sour cream" or "caviar." This is the only time I use a mayonnaise for a dinner salad.

CONTEST RULES — ALL YOU DO — START NOW

To Enter This Simple Contest To Win $500.00 In Gold or—One of 216 Other Prizes in Gold

1 In this simple, fascinating contest, simply see how many standard English 3-letter words you can make from the letters in the words G-O-L-D M-E-D-A-L F-L-O-U-R B-R-I-N-G-S B-A-K-I-N-G S-U-C-C-E-S-S. For example, G-E-M is a standard English word containing 3 letters and is made up of G from GOLD, E and M from MEDAL. B-I-N from BRINGS. O-R-E from gOld, flouR, mEdal.

2 In making a word you can use a letter only as many times as it appears in the words GOLD MEDAL FLOUR BRINGS BAKING SUCCESS.

3 Words spelled exactly alike but having different meanings will not be counted separate words.

4 Standard English words shall be interpreted as actual English words shown in any standard English dictionary.* Words indicated by symbols in your dictionary as Foreign, Obsolete, Archaic, Poetic or as Proper Names or Proper Nouns or as Prefixes or Suffixes or Abbreviations or Contractions will not count.

5 Make a list of all the standard English 3-letter words as defined above, number the words in the order in which you set them down. Count the words and put the number of your count on the first page of your list. Put your name and address and the name and address of your grocer on the list and send it in, together with the recipe folder which you find inside a sack of Gold Medal "Kitchen-tested" Flour, to Gold Medal Flour Contest Editor, Minneapolis, Minn. (If you are unable to obtain a recipe folder, simply write Dept. A, Gold Medal Contest Editor, Minneapolis, Minn., requesting one and it will be sent free and postpaid —you don't have to buy to enter this contest.)

6 The person sending in the longest, most accurate list of correct standard English 3-letter words (that is, the longest, most accurate and correct in the opinion of the judges who are James Weber Linn, Professor of English in the University of Chicago; W. J. Christian of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and Ralph Dennis, Dean of the School of Speech of Northwestern University) will receive the first prize of $500 in gold. The person sending in the next longest, most accurate list will receive second prize of $200 in gold. The 5 persons sending in the next 5 longest, most accurate lists will each receive $50 in gold. The 10 persons sending in the next 10 longest, most accurate lists will each receive $20 in gold. The 20 persons sending in the next 20 longest, most accurate lists will each receive $10 in gold. The 80 persons sending in the next 80 longest, most accurate lists will each receive $5 in gold. The 100 persons sending in the next 100 longest, most accurate lists will each receive $2.50 in gold.

7 In the event of ties for any prize offered, a prize identical with that tied for will be awarded to each tying contestant. Each contestant, in submitting his or her entry does so with the understanding that the opinion of the judges is to be accepted as final in any or all matters pertaining to the contest, and that no entries will be returned.

8 Prize winners agree to accept notification by mail as soon as possible after contest closes.

9 Only one prize will be awarded in any one family.

10 Only entries which are postmarked before midnight, Sunday, February 26, 1933, will be accepted.

REMEMBER—be sure to mail your list of standard English 3-letter words conforming to the above rules, with your name and address and the name and address of your grocer, together with a recipe folder which you will find inside any size sack of Gold Medal "Kitchen-tested" Flour, to Gold Medal Flour Contest Editor, Minneapolis, Minn. (If you are unable to obtain a recipe folder, simply write Dept. A, Gold Medal Contest Editor, Minneapolis, Minn., requesting one and it will be sent free and postpaid —you don't have to buy to enter this contest.) Send all to Gold Medal Flour Contest Editor, Minneapolis, Minn., before midnight, Sunday, February 26, 1933.

PLEASE NOTE: The reason we ask you to send the name and address of your grocer is that grocers will also be awarded prizes in this great contest

* Webster's and Funk and Wagnalls' dictionaries will be used by the judges

That Purple Stamp

"HAVE you seen the little round stamp on meat which reads, 'U. S. Inspected and Passed'?" asked W. R. M. Wharton of the Food & Drug Administration of the United States Department of Agriculture in a recent radio talk.

"Well, friends," he continued, "this little stamp on meat means that the animals furnishing the meat have been inspected both before and after slaughter, by expert veterinary inspectors of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry. It means that the meat comes from healthy animals and that it was clean and wholesome in every way at the time of inspection and is fit and proper for food.

Canned Meats, Too

"The Bureau of Animal Industry also inspects many other meat products—sausages — cured and canned meats at establishments where interstate commerce is involved, and all such products must pass rigid inspection and be wholesome, healthful and sound before they are allowed to bear the 'Inspected and Passed' legend."

The meats now put up in cans include bacon; beef, boiled, corned, dried and roast; beef steak with onions; beef stew; brains; ham, deviled and in loaf; hamburger steak; hash; stewed kidney; liver with bacon and with onions; roast mutton; pigs' feet; potted meats; sausage, alone and with sauerkraut; tongue, calf's, lamb and ox; boiled tripe; veal loaf and veal roast. There are also ready-made entrées containing meat such as beef à la mode, chop suey, Hungarian style goulash, Irish stew, etc.

This inspection applies only to meat and meat food products which are prepared in plants engaged in interstate commerce, but most canned foods are so prepared.

Attempted Assassination of President-Elect Roosevelt

According to a radio report late Wednesday night, Joe Zingara, 33-year-old Italian, attempted to assassinate President-Elect Roosevelt as he was delivering a short speech in a big park in the city of Miami, Fla., after completing a vacation cruise aboard a yacht in Florida waters. Twenty-five thousand people had gathered in the park to greet Roosevelt and among them was Mayor Cermak of Chicago.

Five people were wounded in the shooting, Mayor Cermak being one of the two most critically injured. According to a radio report from Miami as we go to press, he was resting good, and there were hopes for his recovery.

Mrs. W. F. Cross, over whose shoulder the assassin was shooting, and Thomas Armour, both of Miami, grappled with Zingara and averted a national calamity by throwing off his aim, sparing President-Elect Roosevelt's life.

When being questioned by the Sheriff after his arrest, Zingara said he hated Presidents and Kings. He stated that his intentions had been to shoot Hoover within a few days but when he found out Roosevelt was coming to Miami he decided to stay and assassinate him first.

Crop Loans

The department of agriculture have announced that disbursements of money to farmers under the $90,000,000 crop production loan bill signed Feb. 11 by President Hoover will begin March 1.

Secretary Hyde will after approving regulations to govern the loans issue instructions to executives in regional offices at Dallrs, St. Louis, Memphis, Salt Lake City, Washington and in Minneapolis.

A reduction of the maximum loans to individual farmers from $400, as was allowed in 1932, to $300 this year is being considered because of the increase in applications expected. The bill authorized the secretary to require acreage reduction up to 30 per cent as a loan condition, and the department expects to require the full reduction, except in the case of minor acreages.

An increase of about a third in the number of loans over last year is looked for. The department is having thirty per cent more application forms printed than were used in 1932, when $64,000,000 was disbursed.

Requests for changes in legislation in some states to make farmers within their borders eligible for loans are being made by the department through members of congress. The law requires that the loan shall be the lien on the crop produced this year.

Whether the department shall make loans to farmers who have not repaid their borrowings under similar loan acts in past years has not yet been decided.

Double Grief

A widow had received her fourth letter from an insurance company asking for more evidence to support her claims as the beneficiary of the husband. "I am having so much trouble getting that money," she told a friend, "my poor, dear husband might just about as well not have died at all for all the good his insurance will do me."

THANK YOU!

I wish to thank those who so kindly surprised me last Friday on my 75th birthday and presented me with a floor lamp.

R. R. Reierson

I wish to thank all those who kindly favored me with their votes in the Husky Dog Contest, and hope you will continue to buy the Husky products. I am a booster for Husky.

Annual Creamery Report

We are this week publishing the annual report of the Farmers Cooperative Creamery, which relates in facts and figures what the institution has done in the past year.

Considering times and conditions, the report shows that our local creamery is in first class condition, both financially and mechanically, as compared to other creameries of which we have seen the annual reports.

Deputy Sheriff Kays was here on business last Thursday.

Mrs. Ole Backlund called at the H. O. Hanson home last Thursday afternoon.

Word was received last night that Mrs Arno Steinhauer, who has been ill for some time, was very low at a hospital at Thief River Falls.

About 25 old friends of R. R. Reierson staged a surprise party on him last Friday evening, the event being his 75th birthday. He was presented with an electric floor lamp.

Cards of Thanks

We wish to express our heartfelt thanks to all our neighbors and friends for all the help, kindness, and sympathy shown us during the illness and loss of beloved baby, Thelma Joyce; to Rev. Redal for his words of comfort, to all those who sang, to those who sent flowers, also to the Ladies Aid.

Congress Votes for Repeal of Eighteenth Amendment

Congress Monday proposed to the states that national prohibition, after its 13 years of turbulent trial, be done away with by repeal of the 18th amendment.

The house by a vote of 289 to 121, 15 more than necessary, approved the repeal resolution passed last week by the senate. Under it for the first time in American history, conventions of the people are to decide whether the states shall ratify or reject a change in the constitution.

Thirty-six of the 48 states must ratify to carve the 18th amendment out of the national charter and substitute for it a 21st. By its terms, also, the ratifications must all occur within seven years from today. With repeal, the amendment carries a specific prohibition of importation of intoxicating liquors into any states remaining dry.

As though touched off by a electric signal, immediately after the house vote, legislative action was started in more than half a dozen states to make ready for the conventions.

Only one federal formality remains before the states have the question fully in their keeping. The secretary of state must certify the congressional action to the governors. They will inform the legislatures. In many cases the state executives, however, already had taken steps Monday to rush action.

The official copy of the repeal resolution was delivered to the secretary of state late Monday and work was begun immediately to mail out copies Tuesday.

Funeral Services Conducted

Funeral services were conducted here on Saturday from the Nazareth Lutheran church for Thelma Joyce, the little daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Iver Larson. The little baby girl was born March 23, 1932 and was at the time of her death on Feb. 14, ten months and twenty-two days old.

The bereaved parents and two small brothers remain to mourn the loss of a loved little daughter and sister.

Rev. Redal officiated, and interment was made in the Holt cemetery.

Funeral services were conducted here Monday afternoon from the Nazareth Lutheran church for Christian L. Ring, who passed away at his home here on Feb. 15.

Mr. Ring was born in Ringsaker, Norway, in 1853. There he was united in marriage to Lena Amundson and they spent the greater part of their life in Norway. They came to America in 1903, settling in this community, where they homesteaded and resided ever since.

He leaves his wife and four children to mourn his death. They are Mrs. Oscar Hanson of Mahnomen, Lars Ring of Alexandria, Minn., Axel Ring of Davenport, Iowa, and Mrs. Frank Erickson of Holt.

Rev. Redal officiated and interment was made in the Holt cemetery.

Mr. Houskow of Davenport, Iowa, attended the funeral of Mr. Ring here on Monday. He is the father-in-law of Axel Ring, whom he accompanied up here. Lars Ring of Alexandria also came up with them. They all returned to their home Tuesday.

Life of Nels Swanson

Nels Swanson was born in Skone, Sweden, in 1852 and at the time of his death was 80 years, 5 months and 10 days old. In 1877 he was united in marriage to Bengta Quist. He came to Winnipeg in 1882 and lived there for two years. He then moved to a farm 4 miles north of Erskine, Minnesota, and in 1907 he retired from the farm and moved into the village of Erskine where resided for eight years, operating a hotel there part of the time. In 1915 he came to Holt and, until the time of his death, made his home with his daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Bennes.

His wife and a daughter, Mrs. John B. Peterson of Winger, Minn., have preceded him in death. Those left to mourn the death of a kind and loving father and grandfather are two sons, Nels of Portland, Oregon, and Alfred of Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, one daughter, Mrs. Albert Bennes of Holt. Nine grandchildren and three great grandchildren. He also leaves a sister in Brockton, Mass., and a brother in Sweden.

Funeral services were conducted from the Free Mission church here on Tuesday afternoon with Rev. Myhrer officiating. After the services here the remains were taken to Erskine where a short funeral service were held at the United Lutheran church where Mr. Swanson has been a member for many years. Final rites were conducted at the Erskine cemetery by Rev. Skogerboe, pastor of the United Lutheran church. The earthly remains were then laid to rest by the side of his wife.

His two sons were unable to attend the funeral. Out of town relatives who attended funeral were Mr. and Mrs. Ole Hedman of McIntosh; Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Quist of Crookston, and Beaulah and Berenice Peterson, Winger.

A crowd of about two hundred people were in town last Friday to take in the fourth monthly prize day sponsored by the business men of Holt. Ten dollars in cash and twelve merchandise prizes were given away. Mrs. Ralph Ness and Roy Rustad won a five spot each of the cash.

Washington Born On February 11

Until George Washington reached the age of twenty-one, his birthday came on February 11 instead of February 22. The explanation of this interesting fact formed part of an address by Charles E. Flandrau, a pioneer Minnesota lawyer and judge, which he presented at Winona before the Old Settlers Association of Winona county on February 22, 1901.

The Julian calendar of the Romans, which is the basis of the present calendar, divided the year into 365 days. Since this division made the year too long by eleven minutes and fourteen seconds, an entire day of time accumulated every 128 years. To offset this accumulation, Pope Gregory XIII eliminated ten calendar days in 1582.

Most European states adopted the Gregorian or New Style calendar, but England continued with the old calendar until twenty years after Washington's birth. By that time, however, an additional day had accumulated, which required the elimination of eleven days from the calendar. This resulted in advancing Washington's birthday from February 11 to February 22, the date that has been celebrated since 1752. The manuscript address containing Flandrau's explanation of this fact is in the possession of the Minnesota Historical Society.

Walter Sa[illegible]berg has checked out as manager of the Cities Service station and C. L. Sandberg has now taken it over.

LADY BLANCHE FARM

A Romance of the Commonplace

SYNOPSIS

Motoring through Vermont, Philip Starr, young Boston architect, meets, in unconventional fashion, Blanche Manning, girl of seventeen, with whom he is immediately enamored. In conversation, he learns something of her family history. It being a long distance to Burlington, Starr's destination, Blanche suggests, the village of Hamstead not boasting a hotel, that he become, for the night, a guest of her cousin, Mary Manning. Mary receives Philip with true Vermont hospitality, and he makes the acquaintance of her cousin Paul, recognized as her fiance. Starr finds Mary is acquainted with Gale Hamlin, noted Boston architect, in whose office Philip is employed. He informs her of his desire to win Blanche for his wife. She is sympathetic, and tells him of an old family superstition concerning the "Blanches" of the Manning family.

Violet Manning was an extremely pretty woman with an infinite capacity for doing nothing. She had been the only child, much spoiled and petted, of a shopkeeper in White Water, the next village to Hamstead, who had stinted himself to give her "advantages." She was sent away to a would-be-but-didn't-quite-make-it-fashionable boarding school, and acquired a veneer of culture, and a contempt for her parents, her neighbors, and her home-town, but not very much else. On her return to White Water, after she was "finished" at school, and had taken a three months' trip to Europe she might have been the belle of the countryside if she had only been as pleasant as she was pretty. But her would-be swains fell off, one by one, before the disdain of her manner; and it was with secret relief that, at the age of twenty-five, she accepted Martin Manning, and went to live on Lady Blanche farm. She was careful to convey the impression, to him and to everyone else, that she was doing him a great favor to marry him, and he at least, believed her. A sturdy couple from "out-back"—Horace, or as he was more frequently called, "Hod" Evans and his wife Myra—were installed in the big brick house as "help." And Violet lay in bed late in the morning, and sat in the north parlor—heretofore used only for weddings and funerals—embroidering centerpieces, and went to church on Sunday, dressed considerably better than anyone else in Hamstead. A woman with more brains would soon have been bored into activity by such an existence. But Violet was not bored. She was supremely satisfied at the easy and pleasant lines into which her life had fallen.

When she was a little over thirty, Martin, who still worshiped her blindly, died, leaving her with two small children, and enough money to live on comfortably, if simply. Every Sunday morning she went to church with Blanche and Paul at her side, her heavy black silk dress trailing down the aisle behind her. Every Sunday afternoon she went to the cemetery to place flowers on Martin's grave, taking the children. When the role of bereaved and sorrowing widow began to pall a little, and no one stepped forward to relieve her of it, Violet's laziness took refuge in that of the model housekeeper and devoted mother. Fortunately, with a contentment rare in New England, Myra and Hod stayed on; Myra ran the house to suit herself. Hod helped the hard-working and plodding Seth with the farm labor which Paul was supposed to be too delicate to perform, since an attack of scarlet fever, which had left him in a weakened condition, had given his mother the fixed idea that he had heart trouble. To be sure, Paul mowed the lawns and weeded the garden, but always under her careful supervision. He had been away to a near-by seminary to school, and drifted half way through a course at an agricultural college; but he was not a natural student, and the farm ran along "well enough" without his help. When for no very clear reason, he stated that he had decided not to finish his course, his mother did not try to force him to do so. More through lack of vital interest than through viciousness, he became dissipated. Violet excused him. There were some things, she said, that she couldn't, with modesty, discuss with him. Boys always sowed wild oats for a time, and then settled down and married some nice girl, just as Paul was going to settle down by and by and marry dear Mary. There was no use worrying or making a vulgar fuss over what was coming out all right in the end, anyway. And meanwhile Blanche was such a comfort! Blanche had also inherited her mother's good looks, and the discontent which the latter had felt in her youth, but there was "more Manning" to her, as Hamstead said.

At ten o'clock in the morning following Philip's unceremonious arrival at Lady Blanche farm, Violet was lying in bed with a new novel still [illegible]

"Oh, good morning, dear," said Violet pleasantly, arousing herself, "I've been wondering why you didn't come over. Just take that breakfast tray downstairs, will you? Myra's getting ready to go to church, and seems to have forgotten it.—No, I thought it was raining too hard to attempt going myself. You know how easily I take cold."

"I'm sorry I couldn't get over earlier," said Mary, returning from her trip to the kitchen with the tray. "I hope you'll feel enough better by noon to come over to dinner and meet Mr. Starr."

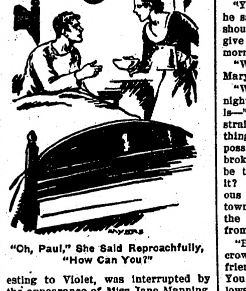
"Oh, my dear, I couldn't. I don't even feel equal to the effort of walking over to the bureau to comb my hair—Why, yes, if you feel like doing it—don't pull it.—So he didn't leave this morning?"

"No," answered Mary, brushing out the long soft curls to their full length, "it was raining so dreadfully hard that it didn't seem best for him to attempt it. He's been sick, as I told you last night. He's telephoned his friends in Burlington not to expect him just yet. Well, he'll be disappointed not to see you, he's so crazy over everything that's beautiful. I think he really ought to have been an artist, not 'on the side' as he says, but for his real profession, instead of being an architect. But of course there isn't usually as much money in it. He's with Davis and Hamlin—"

"Gale Hamlin?"

"Yes. He told me after I went home last night. It makes me feel as if we knew him quite well already."

At this moment, the conversation, which was becoming extremely interesting to Violet, was interrupted by the appearance of Miss Jane Manning, who entered somewhat brusquely, and without knocking. None of the famous "Manning looks" had fallen to her lot. She was probably one of the plainest women the Lord had ever made, certainly the plainest that He had seen fit to place in Hamstead.



"Oh, Paul," She Said Reproachfully, "How Can You?"

"Well, Violet— Well, Mary," she said abruptly, "aren't either of you goin' to church this mornin'?"

Violet murmured her excuses, Mary, who never either murmured or excused anything, stated her reasons plainly.

"I've got too much to do," she said, "with the children to look after, and dinner to get, and everything."

"What's this I hear," asked Cousin Jane, "about your taking in some strange young man that Blanche picked up by the roadside? You ought to be ashamed of yourself, Violet, for letting that girl traipse around so! Any tramp that'll come along and ask for a meal you'll welcome, Mary."

"Oh, Mr. Starr isn't a tramp," replied Mary pleasantly, "he's quite an important person." And she repeated her biographical sketch of Philip's career with enthusiasm. But Cousin Jane was not to be side-tracked.

"What do you know about his principles?" she asked without compromise. "Accordin' to your account, he's spent considerable time in France, and when that's been said, there ain't much more to add. We know what the French are like." This was entirely untrue, but Cousin Jane believed it to be so, and said it with a conviction that carried weight.

"Well, he looks delicate, just now, of course, because he's been sick, but there's something awfully clean and wholesome about him. And he looks you straight in the face, and comes right to the point about things. He knows his own mind, and he laughs as if he didn't have a thing on his conscience, and he likes books and flowers and children; and if those aren't all good signs of a Christian, I don't know what are!"

"You don't know anything about religion at all," retorted Miss Manning. "I'm shocked to hear you speak so. Yes, I'll be over to dinner and see him for myself. I don't want to judge, of course, but I'm prepared for the worst— Where's Paul?"

"Paul isn't well, this morning," his mother said hastily. "He's in bed, too. He's really more delicate than any of you realize—if he gets the least bit over-tired, he has a dreadful headache, just as I do. He was out rather late last night. That reminds me, Mary, he called out to me just before you came in, that if you did come over, he wished you'd bring him up a pitcher of icewater and a bowl of cracked ice. He hated to ask Myra to get it for him, because he knew she'd give him a temperance lecture. Not that he's been really drinking, of course, but naturally, young fellows like a glass of ale or so when they go out in [illegible] evening. You better go and [illegible] him now. And I'm awfully afraid you'll be late to church, Jane, if you don't hurry. I believe I'll get up after all. I'd hate to disappoint Mr. Starr if he really wants so much to meet me, and I'll make an effort to come over to dinner, Mary. I hope I shan't suffer for it afterwards."

CHAPTER IV

The dinner which Mary stayed home from church to cook, was not an entire success, either in her eyes or in the eyes of anyone else who attended it, with the possible exception of Blanche and Philip.

In the first place, it was prepared somewhat hurriedly, and with a sore and grieving spirit—a combination of misfortunes which has proved disastrous to more pretentious banquets. Going into her cousin's room with the bowl of ice and pitcher of icewater, Mary found Paul, clad in pale-blue pajamas, lying on his back in bed, his face lined and white, black rings about his closed eyes.

In spite of her wholesome freshness, Mary was by no means stupid. She knew perfectly well that "shows" in Wallacetown were apt to include other things "on the side," and she knew, too, that a drawn, mask-like pallor might be as certain an indication of dissipation as a puffy flush.

"Oh, Paul," she said reproachfully, "how can you?"

Paul sat up in bed, reaching for the icewater. "How can I what?" he asked crossly.

"You know."

"I'm sure I don't. You're not very definite. Put some of that cracked ice in a handkerchief, will you, and wrap it around my head."

Mary complied in silence. Paul lay down again, and kept very still for some minutes, his tense expression gradually relaxing. Then he smiled, and put his arm around her.

"You're an awfully good girl, Mary," he said softly. "I don't know what I should do without you. Won't you give me a kiss? You haven't yet, this morning."

"Whom did you kiss last?" asked Mary in a hard voice.

"Why you, right after supper last night! Don't you remember? That is—" Mary's gray eyes were looking straight into his, and there was something in them which Paul found it impossible to meet. "Look here," he broke off angrily, "you are getting to be the greatest prude, do you know it? And an awfully suspicious, jealous one at that. I went to Wallacetown with Jack Weston and some of the White Water crowd—no one else from Hamstead."

"By 'some of the White Water crowd,' I don't suppose you mean our friends and relatives there, do you? You mean some of the girls and fellows that have just come to work in the new mill?"

"Well, what if I do? There's no harm in working in a mill, is there?"

"No—in fact, I think it's rather better to work in a mill than it is to loaf on a farm. Go on."

"I won't go on," said Paul, more angrily than he had spoken before. "You're enough to drive a fellow to drink—or worse—supposing I had done anything worse. But what does it amount to—kissing a pretty girl that you've had a lark with, when you say 'good-night'—anyway! It's only what she expects. It doesn't mean anything."

"It doesn't seem to—to you," replied Mary, very quietly.

"Oh, Lord! I mean, of course, it doesn't amount to anything wrong. Come back here—"

But Mary was gone, shutting the door behind her.

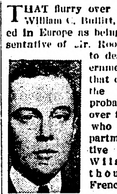
Outside the house, she hesitated, her lips quivering, her eyes full of tears. She couldn't—she couldn't—go home feeling the way she did, and start getting dinner. The village clock, striking eleven, decided her. Undeterred by the rain, which was still gently falling, she walked up the road towards a little mountain which was part of the farm, and called in memory of the first Blanche, who had loved to go there, "Countess Hill."

It was very quiet on the mountain. Mary, walking up one of the wide, needle-strewn paths that led to the top, the soft rain hardly penetrating the thick trees, began, almost immediately, to find peace and what she wanted still more—time and space to think resolutely about Paul. What should she do—what ought she to do? Break her engagement? How much, she asked herself, with a quick little quiver of pain, would he care if she did? Why was she always fated to make herself so unattractive to him, to be so tactless, when she was trying only to be fair and honest? And would either of them be any better off if she made what would be, to her, a heart-breaking sacrifice? In vain she admitted that neither her reason nor her instinct should allow her to love a man whom she did not respect or trust, not nearly as much as she already respected and trusted Philip Starr, who, twenty-four hours earlier had been a complete stranger to her. The fact remained that she did love Paul, with every fiber of her being, far more deeply, far more passionately, than she had ever let him see. She always had—she always would.

He had not actually even proposed to her. Their kisses had changed a little in character, had become more frequent—some way, through embraces growing less cousinly and more loverlike they had reached "an understanding." It was not clear in the minds of either of them how or when. But from that faintly determined time, Paul had become all in all to Mary, and Mary had gradually become less than she was before to Paul.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

THAT flurry over the activities of William C. Bullitt, who was reported in Europe as being a secret representative of Mr. Roosevelt sent over to deal with the governments of nations that owe war debts to the United States, probably has blown over for good. Bullitt, who was a State department representative under Woodrow Wilson, also was thought by some French officials to be an emissary of Col. Edward M. House. He visited London, Paris and other capitals and conferred with various high personages, and our State department called on Ambassador Edge for information. The ambassador replied that Bullitt was acting on his own responsibility as a writer interested in foreign affairs and was representing no one in the United States.



W. C. Bullitt

Mr. Edge, it is understood, reported that this is only one of many similar incidents. Ever since Mr. Roosevelt's nomination, the embassy has had reports of a long succesion of such "emissaries."

VARIOUS plans for the regeneration of the Republican party have been discussed, and one already has been started. This is the organization of the National Republican league, with Vice President Charles Curtis at its head and headquarters in Washington. Three vice chairmen have been named —Senators Felix Hebert of Rhode Island and Daniel O. Hastings of Delaware and former Representative John Q. Tilson of Connecticut. The make-up of the league appears to be strictly regular Republican.

The new organization announced by John A. Campbell of White Plains, N. Y., who will be its director, is designed to carry on a vigorous campaign for a comeback not only in the 1936 Presidential election but in next year's congressional races also. It is professedly neither for nor against the interests of any one candidate.

The senate Republican organization seems determined to continue in good standing in the party caucus the insurgents who supported Roosevelt last fall. Senator Charles L. McNary of Oregon, the probable new Republican leader of the senate, declared that a proposal to read out of the party Senators George W. Norris of Nebraska, Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin, Hiram Johnson of California, and Bronson Cutting of New Mexico, had "not a chance in the world" to succeed.

Suggestions were heard recently that Secretary of the Treasury Mills would be made chairman of the Republican national committee, but he said he would not accept the place. "I've had a lot of politics in the last 25 years and I don't intend to step out of here into the chairmanship of any political committee," Mills said.

GREAT BRITAIN'S cabinet in three sessions gave final approval to the British policy for negotiations with Mr. Roosevelt in the debt conference to be held in Washington. Of course the cabinet's conclusions were not made public, but it was understood Ambassador Sir Ronald Lindsay would bring back a plan providing for a lump sum payment of between $1,250,000,000 and $2,000,000,000 as settlement for the entire debt of about $11,000,000,000 which the European nations owe the United States. This, the debtor nations think, would be in accord with their own Lausanne agreement on German reparations.

Representative Rainey of Illinois declared: "The United States will not accept any such slash," and opinion in congressional circles upheld this view. Moreover, Mr. Roosevelt's plan of dealing with each nation separately will give the British small opportunity to put forward a proposal for all of them.

GERMANY'S new government under Chancellor Hitler is not to have smooth sailing by any means and may be upset at the coming elections. The Socialists and Communists were trying strenuously to lay aside their differences and join in the fight against the Nazis, and it seemed likely they would succeed in this.

Vice Chancellor Von Papen, armed with a decree signed by President Von Hindenberg, assumed the premiership of Prussia, dissolved the diet of that state and ordered new elections on March 5. Premier Braun and the other old Prussian ministers were summarily ousted. The government also issued a new set of severe laws curtailing the right of assembly and of free speech and gagging the press.

PREMIER DALADIER postponed the downfall of his new French government for a time by temporarily abandoning the attempt to balance the budget. The cabinet rejected a proposal to reduce the pay of employees of the state, and approved measures which would slightly increase the taxes on gasoline and bank checks. All told, it approved measures designed to provide $232,000,000, half of which would be in new taxes and half resulting from economies in civil expenditures. This measure will be operative until another budget project can be drafted.

RECENT deaths of note were those of Dr. Lawrence F. Abbott, former president and publisher of the Outlook and close friend of Theodore Roosevelt; and Count Albert Apponyi of Hungary, the oldest statesman of the League of Nations and a powerful political figure in his country.

Good Health Rules for Girl in Teens

By AMELIA H. GRANT, M. A., R. N.
Director, Bureau of Nursing,
New York City Department of Health.

FRESH AIR AND SUNSHINE FOR HEALTH

Fresh air and sunshine are the two most important elixirs in nature's cabinet of health. Every girl in her teens should be outdoors as much as possible throughout the year. During the warmer months she should expose as much of her skin to the air and sunshine as circumstances will permit.

However, you should avoid sunburn, sometimes a very serious condition. Acquire your coat of tan gradually, exposing only part of your body each day and then only for a few minutes. You can increase the area and the time each successive exposure until the whole body is tanned. In this way you escape sunburn. Tanning of the skin results in the production of vitamin D, which is indispensable in the development of strong bones and sound teeth.

Always breathe through the nose, and breathe deeply, especially in the open while walking, hiking, swimming or playing. Remember these two points—breathe through the nose and breathe deeply.

Sleep in well-ventilated rooms, summer and winter. Have all windows wide open. If you use plenty of bed clothes you need have no fear of cold.

NOW! EASE A SORE THROAT INSTANTLY
Feel Rawness, Irritation, Go At Once
These Pictures Tell You What To Do

GARGLE Thoroughly—Throw Your Head Way Back, Allowing a Little to Trickle Down Your Throat.

Remember Only Medicine Helps A Sore Throat

Modern medical science now throws an entirely new light on sore throat. A way that eases the pain, rawness and irritation in as little as two or three minutes.

Results are among the most extraordinary in medical science. On doctors' advice, millions are following this way . . . discarding old-time "washes" and "antiseptics." For it has been found that only medicine can help a sore throat.

Simple To Do. All you do is crush and dissolve three BAYER Aspirin Tablets in half a glass of water. Gargle with it twice—as pictured above. If you have any indication of a cold—before gargling take 2 Bayer Aspirin Tablets with a full glass of water. This is to combat any signs of cold that have gone into your system. Keep on taking if cold has a "hold." For Genuine Bayer Aspirin will not harm you. Your doctor will tell you, it does not depress the heart. Get a box of 12 or a bottle of 24 or 100 at any drug store.

Reduces Infection, Eases Pain Instantly. Gargling with Bayer Aspirin will do three things: Relieve soreness at once. Allay inflammation. AND—reduce infection; which is the important thing in fighting a sore throat.

It requires medicine—like BAYER ASPIRIN—to do these things! That is why throat specialists throughout America are prescribing this BAYER gargle in place of old-time ways. Results are quick and amazing.

Be careful, however, that you get real BAYER Aspirin Tablets for this purpose. For they dissolve completely enough to gargle without leaving irritating particles. Watch this when you buy.

CRAB MADE TROUBLE

There are drawbacks to buying live crabs and carrying them home with no more protection than a paper wrapping, as a Sofia business man recently learned to his sorrow.

This man, according to a New York Times correspondent, attemped to read a newspaper in a crowded street car with a paper-wrapped crab under his arm. Suddenly the woman sitting next to him, who happened to be wearing a short-sleeved dress, jumped up, tore the newspaper out of his hands and slapped him in the face. The crab had torn its way through the paper and pinched her arm and she thought the man had pinched her himself.

Cuticura Healed

"For almost a year I was troubled with blemishes that took the form of pimples and blackheads. My face and shoulders were the affected parts. The pimples were large and red and my shoulders became sore from the rubbing of my shoulder straps. The pimples itched and after scratching them they festered and were so sore that I could not sleep.

"People suggested many remedies; I tried all but to no avail. Cuticura Soap and Ointment were suggested and I was completely healed, after using three cakes of Cuticura Soap and two boxes of Cuticura Ointment." (Signed) Miss Helen Mann, 7515 Claridge St., Phila., Pa., July 21, 1932.

With the NORTH DAKOTA LAWMAKERS
LATEST NEWS OF THE WORK OF THE STATE LEGISLATURE CONDENSED FOR THE BUSY READERS

Bismarck.—Work of building the new $2000,000 state capitol would be placed under direct supervision and control of the board of administration, in a bill introduced in the lower house of the North Dakota legislature and drawn by three members of the legislative investigating committee probing the work of the present capitol commission. A board of capitol commissioners would be retained but the measure provides, "the members of the board of administration shall constitute such board of capitol commissioners." Authors of the bill are Lillehaugen of Walsh, Peterson of Mountrail, and Flannigan of Stutsman.

Th new board would operate under provisions of the law enacted in 1931 providing for construction of the building to replace the one destroyed by fire in 1930. According to Peterson's explanation of the bill, the proposed group would be empowered to annul contracts, the measure providing that "it having been made to appear to the legislative assembly that good cause has been shown to authorize the annulment of certain contracts already entered into, the said board is hereby authorized and empowered to annul, amend and adjust existing contracts for and in behalf of the state of North Dakota." An emergency clause is included in the bill.

Senator Matthaei, chairman of the legislative investigating group studying work of the capitol commission, declared late in the week that he planned to issue subpoenas for George L. Bangs, Grand Forks, and Fred L. Conklin, Bismarck, members of the commission. This decision was reached following a request made to him by Senator Brunsdale, one of the investigators, to subpoena the two commissioners and he said the rules of the group made it mandatory the subpoenas be issued.

With members of the legislature scheduled to complete their duties in less than three weeks, thirty-five bills were introduced in the assemblies on Friday of the past week, as the time for presenting legislation neared expiration. Twenty-three of these bills were offered in the house as members decided the time for introduction of new measures due to expire the following day, was to be interpreted to include any bills brought in up to 2 p. m. Monday of this week. In the senate, after 12 bils were introduced, the chairman ruled last Saturday as the final day for presenting additional proposals.

The senate action brought the total bills introduced to 253, or two more than the number presented for the entire session in 1931, while the house was 54 bills away from the mark set two years ago when the total was 313.

Following a supreme court decision holding as unconstitutional, section 2 of the initiated measure which slashed salaries of appointive state officials, employees of appointive state boards and bureaus, deputies, assistants, secretaries and clerks, and faculty members of the higher state institutions, came discussions by appropriations committees of the two legislative branches for plans to introduce a bill to provide for a 20 per cent reduction of salaries of state appointive officials and employees. The bill would re-enact provisions of the salary reduction law, held unconstitutional by the state supreme court.

Designed particularly to permit North Dakota farmers to take advantage of the 90 million dollars in federal aid available for seed and crop production loans, a measure was introduced in the senate by Whelan of Pembina. Because the anti-crop mortgage law was placed on the statutes by vote in June and kept there by another vote in November, farmers of North Dakota wil get no part of the 90 million dollars unless the legislature takes action of some kind. Whelan's bill would amend the existing law so that the anti-crop mortgages would not apply to a mortgage in favor of the United States or any department or agency thereof.

Creation of the office of "conservation commissioner," for which $20,000 would be diverted biannualy from the game and fish fund is provided for in a measure presented in the senate. The bill designates the state engineer as the commissioner, with a deputy to be appointed by the governor, at a salary of $1,800 a year. Conservation of surface waters within the state is given as the purpose of the proposed act. An emergency clause is attached.

Senator W. E. "Fighting Bill" Martin of Morton, who leaped into the limelight with his proposal that 39 states secede from the Union, was again in the foreground when he asked for abolition of North Dakota's present legislative system and creation of a one-house legislature to consist of one member from each county. Other proposals by the veteran Morton county legislator during the present session have been: legalization of farm strikes, use of militia to protect strikes and prohibiting lawyers from serving in the legislature.

A new regulatory department under control of a "director" to be named by the governor, was proposed in the house by Anfinson of Rolette. The new department would supervise work of at least a dozen divisions of state government, including the food commissioner, director of the regulatory division of the agricultural college, director of the experiment station, state chemist, chief sanitary inspector and inspector of the licensing department. The regulatory "czar" would draw a salary of $4,000 a year and could be removed by the governor without cause at any time. Nine inspectors would aid him in his work. One would be inspector of oils, two would be appointed at large, and six others would represent each of the judicial districts of the state.

By a narrow margin, the house voted to place on the calendar for passage, H. B. 76, which repeals all but a few of the prohibition statutes now on the books. A new beer bill to replace the now famous "77" indefinitely postponed earlier in the week, was tossed in the senate hopper. Twichell, house member from Cass, fighting against the measure, argued that the laws should be kept on the statute books at least until repeal of the 18th amendment.

"Repeal these laws," Twichell shouted, "and they'll be selling beer over soda fountains and in pool halls."

Legislative authority to enact laws to permit juries to consist of less than 12 persons, and to make it possible for three-fourths of a jury to return a verdict in civil or criminal cases, except felonies, is sought in a proposed constitutional amendment by request by Senator Banget, Ransom. The amendment would also authorize enactment of laws to permit trial by jury to be waived in all cases, except felonies.

In another senate bill, the board of administration would be authorized to rebuild and enlarge the power plant at the state penitentiary to provide sufficient electric current to operate the manufacturing industries that are or may be established at the prison, and for supplying electric current for the Bank of North Dakota building, memorial building, and state capitol.

A commission of public utilities, consisting of the tax commissioner as an ex-officio member and two members of the railroad commission, is provided for in a measure introduced in the senate. An appropriation of $25,000 as a revolving fund to pay expenses of the commission until the expenses of operation are paid by the utilities under its supervision, is provided for in the bill. On complaint of 25 per cent of patrons of a public utility that rates are unreasonable, the commission would be authorized to hold a formal hearing. Investigation could also be carried on by motion of the commission.

Action by Governor Langer awaited 12 bils passed by the house, including seven from the senate. Among the measures, is one providing a one-year moratorium on mortgages extending from one to two years the period of redemption from mortgage foreclosures and real estate execution sales.

Two measures affecting dentists, one permitting them to sign death certificates and another making it legal for them to administer intoxicating liquors to patients, were passed.

In two bills sent to the senate, trapping licenses would be lowered to $1, fishing licenses to 50 cents and sportsmen would be permitted to kill snowy owls.

A tax of 1 cent for each 10 cents paid for admission to show exhibitions, cabarets, or dances would be imposed by a measure introduced by Burkhart, Ward, and Fine, Benson. They would also impose a tax of 10 per cent on the wholesale price of cigars, tobacco, and chewing tobacco.

A house bill would provide that farmers be permitted to exchange grain or livestock for payment of their livestock for pament of their delinquent real estate and personal property taxes.

Abolition of the motor vehicle registration department and transferring the duties of the office to the clerks of district courts and a registrar to serve under the highway commissioner, are provided for in a bill introduced in the senate by Bonzer of Richland. The present motor vehicle quarters would be disposed of and the registrar who would replace him would make his office in the highway department.

The senate committee on elections and election privileges has gone on record as favoring for passage a bill which would abolish a presidential primary. A new bill which would provide for restoration of the caucus and convention system was introduced by Erickson of Kidder.

A bill legalizing Sunday movies introduced in the house, provides that operators of theaters must obtain a permit from the county auditor in the county in which the performances are given, the permits to be good for one year and the fee to be 50 cents for each seat in the theater.

By a vote of 29 to 18, the senate defeated a measure by which Immigration Commissioner Devine would be continued as manager of the world's fair commission.

The measure was designed to retain Devine on the commission after the immigration department is abolished, as provided in a bil passed by both assemblies.

The measure to retain Devine provided for a salary of $150 a month during the existence of the fair commission.

Erickson, Kidder, offered a bill to tax "all assocaitions, corporations, individuals, or groups who engage in furnishing meals or lodgings for profit."

NEW BOW FOR VIOLIN

For centuries past the violin bow has been made of horsehide. It is perhaps a lucky thing that, just as the horse is disappearing, a German fiddler has invented a bow string with silver wires. These wires are of about the same thickness as horsehair, and as they are slightly roughened on the surface they vibrate the strings perfectly without the use of resin. The tone, it is claimed, is far better than is given by the ordinary bow.

Fifty and Fit

At fifty, you can be in your prime.

Why go along with "fairly good health" when you might be enjoying vigor you haven't felt for years?

There's a simple little thing anyone can do to keep the vital organs stimulated, and feel fit all the time. People don't realize how sluggish they've grown until they've tried it. The stimulant that will stir your system to new life is Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin. It will make a most amazing difference in many ways.

This famous doctor's prescription is a delicious syrup made with fresh herbs, active senna, and pure pepsin. It starts its good work with the first spoonful. That's all you need to drive away the dullness and headache of a bilious spell, and rid the system of that slow poison that saps your strength. It's better than a tonic for tired bowels, and unlike habit-forming laxatives you can take it freely or give it to any child. And it isn't expensive.

Get some syrup pepsin today, and take a little tonight. Don't wait until you're sick to give your system this wonderful help. You can avoid those spells of biliousness or constipation. A spoonful every now and then is better than constant worry about the condition of your bowels, or fear of auto-intoxication as you grow older. Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin protects the system. All druggists keep this preparation.

Drive Carefully and Save Lives

Geo. Fricker, village clerk, received word last week from the State Highway Dept. that they have designated the street they use as a highway thru the village as a "thru" street and that stop signs will soon be put up on all intersections of the highway street and cross streets to warn traffic of such regulation.

In the meantime, take the advice we gave you several times thru the columns of the News and STOP when entering the highway whether you see signs or not, as we have never heard of one of these signs bringing anyone back to life after being smashed to hamburger in an auto collision.

Drive carefully at all times.

Minutes of School Meeting

Minutes of regular school meeting held Feb. 13, 1933. All members present.

Moved and seconded that minutes of two previous meetings stand approved as read.

The following bills were allowed:

Marshall Co. State Bank, Int. on warrants	$5.67
Interstate Power Co., lights	8.04

Moved by Fricker and seconded by Sanoden that we continue with three years of high school. Motion carried.

Moved by Ness and seconded by Nohre that we rehire E. O. Nybakken for the coming year at a salary of $1700, a reduction of $100. Motion carried.

Moved and seconded that meeting be adjourned. Motion carried.

G. SANODEN,
District Clerk.

THANK YOU!

I wish to thank all those who surprised me on my 68th birthday Monday, Feb. 27, and presented me with a number of gifts as a kind remembrance.

Local Shipping Assn. Appoint Backlund Manager

The board of directors of the Holt Cooperative Shipping Assn. held their regular monthly meeting on Monday and appointed O. J. Backlund as manager for the association for the coming year.

Mr. Backlund was elected as a director on the board at the annual meeting of the association members on Jan. 30. Anton Rodahl was now appointed director to take his place.

H. Moberg, who has been shipping manager for the association since it was organized here, resigned that job on Monday and announced that he will ship stock independently.

Annual Creamery Meeting Proved Interesting Affair

The stockholders of the Farmers Cooperative Creamery held their 26th annual meeting on Thursday of last week and it proved to be a lively doing. J. P. Augustine was reelected to serve on the board, and O. H. Nohre was the new member added. He was appointed some time ago to fill the unexpired term of Olaus Rodahl.

Many questions of interest to the creamery patrons were discussed and agreed upon at the meeting.

R. J. Lund of Thief River Falls, who audited the books for the creamery, was here and explained the financial statement, and Ben Ommodt, field man for this district, explained a lot of things about how a creamery should be operated in order to come out at the end of the year.

B. O. Norby, manager of the Land O'Lakes plant in Thief River Falls, was here and explained about the handling of eggs and poultry.

The Holt Community Band furnished a program of good peppy music. Free lunch was served after the meeting.

The Flavor of Butter

Butter has a flavor all its own—smooth, delicate, meltingly delicious.

One of the surest ways of making foods savory and palatable, is to use plenty of butter in their preparation.

Use butter, on the table,
In cooking, frying, and roasting,
In seasoning meats, fish and vegetables,
In making pies and all kinds of cakes,
In desserts, puddings and sauces,
In candy, sweets, and delicacies.

Life of Ingvald Larson

Funeral services were conducted here on Saturday afternoon from the Nazareth Lutheran church for Ingvald, Larson 25 years old, who passed away at his home here Saturday morning February 18, after an illness which had kept him in bed for several months. Rev. Redal officiated and interment was made in the Holt cemetery.

Ingvald Larson, son of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Larson was born at East Valley Feb. 6, 1908. He was baptized by Rev. Palm. Besides attending common school in Holt township, he also was instructed in religion which terminated his confirmation by Rev. M. B. Ordahl.

Ingvald was known as a home loving boy, satisfied with the daily routine of the farm life. His great interest for music caused him to join the Holt Community Band as a charter member.

He was preceded in death by his father who passed away in 1920, and a brother, Joseph who passed away in 1922. Surviving him are his aged mother, Mrs. Fred Larson, four brothers, Ludvik, Ole, Alfred and Iver Larson, and two sisters, Mrs. Willie Sorum and Mrs. Norman Peterson.

Chosen President of Board

J. P. Augustine was again renamed president of the board of directors of the Farmers Cooperative creamery here at the directors meeting held Monday. Fred Voth is vice-president and T. B. Folden is secretary and treasurer. The other members on the board are E. Waagedahl and O. Nohre.

T. Kolden and family whom have been making their home on the A. Attwood farm southwest of Holt for the past two years, moved onto the old Mickelson east of town yesterday.

Frank Erickson of Mud Lake has rented the old O'Hara farm southwest of town and is now busy hauling his hay there.

Victor Ranstrom who is on the place will move onto the Flann farm farther south.

Card of Thanks

We hereby wish to express our thanks to all those who assisted us during the illness and death of our beloved husband and father. We also thank Rev. Redal for his comforting words.

Death of Mrs. Arno Steinhauer

The people of this community were shocked last Friday morning to hear of the death of Mrs. Arno Steinhauer, who passed away at a hospital in Thief River Falls early that morning after an illness from which she suffered for several weeks. She was at the time of her death on Feb. 24, 38 years 10 months and 27 days old.

Mrs. Marie Martha Steinhauer was born in Excell township on March 27, 1894, and was a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Martin Kisch, pioneers in this community. She spent all her life in Excell township and was a resident of Marshall county through out her 38 years of life.

Funeral services were conducted on Tuesday, Feb. 28, at 2 p. m., from the Community church in Thief River Falls, Rev. E. A. Cooke officiating. Interment was made in Greenwood cemetery in that city.

She was married on Jan. 14, 1914, at Thief River Falls, to Arno Steinhauer. Those left to mourn her loss are her husband, one son, Adolph, and one daughter, Irene, all at home here, and her father, Martin Kisch, of Austria Hungary; her mother, Mrs. Mary Kisch of Thief River Falls; two sisters, Mrs. N. E. Muzzy of Excell township and Mrs. Melvin Rude of Moorhead; and two brothers, Andrew Kisch of Excell township and Paul Kisch of Thief River Falls. One brother preceded her in death.

Hans Larsons Leave

Hans Larson and family who have been making their home here the past five years moved to Oslo on Wednesday. Mr. Larson sold out his meat market equipment here some time ago to Martin Sneby at Newfolden who has this week moved the outfit to that village and will run a shop in his big store there.

W. Larson of Newfolden took all his equipment to Oslo where he will install it in the and meat and grocery store that he and his brother Hans will operate.

We regret to see the Larson family go but, wish them all kinds of prosperity and luck.

Spring is around the corner. So is prosperity. The only difference is, that spring comes some time.

Democratic Inauguration Comes Off Tomorrow

All the dyed-in-the-wool Republicans whom have for past twelve long years, fought to the last ditch in order to keep out the Democrats and line their own pockets with gold, will tomorrow have the opportunity for the first time in sixteen long years to listen to a Democratic inaugural speech.

President-elect Franklin D. Roosevelt will give his inaugural speech tomorrow and has taken a biblical text from Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians as the place in the old family bible upon which he will place his hand when he takes the oath of the presidency.

The Master Timekeepers

THE master clocks of the nation, of which there are three, for safety sake, are encased in a double underground vault at the naval observatory in Washington.

The cases of these clocks are sealed air-tight and are maintained under a constant and uniform temperature and air pressure. The temperature is recorded every seven minutes and is never allowed to change more than one-tenth of a degree Fahrenheit. Obviously, their foundations are as free from vibration as it has been found possible to make them.

Since, clearly, because of their supersensitiveness, better results are obtained by letting them strictly alone, theirs is a peaceful existence. They are never reset or interfered with in any manner whatsoever except as justified for repairs.

Their pendulums are so constructed as to be unaffected by variations in temperature and the form of their escapement is unusual in that the pendulum rod is not directly connected with the escapement, the driving energy being furnished by springs from which the pendulum is suspended.

Observatory officials declare that these clocks display a tendency to run slightly faster as they are in service and that sometimes during the first year after cleaning their daily rate may increase as much as one hundredth of a second per month. These infinitesimal changes do not alarm these officers, however as long as the rate of change is regular, because the amount of variance can be accurately checked by astronomical observations and the exact time readily determined.

SCHOOL NOTES

HIGH SCHOOL

The English I class have completed the booklet which they made for the story of "Silas Marner" and have begun studying "The Merchant of Venice."

—To Whom It May Concern—

Page is the tallest one in the Holt High School and Myran the shortest, in other words, "Slim" and "Spud." Reuben has the biggest feet and Gust is noted for his pimples. Depression must be hitting this community because Stilaf and Murnet change wearing that grey shirt (the old standby) every other day.

According to the report the latest news hasn't arrived yet, so watch next time for further information.

Grades I and II

The following children had 100 in Spelling on Friday: Roy, Ruby, Rueben, Marian, Irene, Ruth, Lillian, Elaine, and Wayne.

After a study of the picture "Saying Grace" by Jean Chardin the second grade decided to write a class poem to remember it by. Harriet suggested the title

SAYING GRACE IN FRANCE
by Grade Two

1. Mother said, "Now, my dear
You must say your table prayer.
If you do not know it all,
I will help you, you're so small.
2. "God is great, God is good—
Mother, may I have my food?"
"But my dear,
You must finish your table
prayer."
3. "And we thank Him for our food.
By his hand we all are fed—
Mother, I can't say the rest."
"But you will have to try your

4. "You must listen now, my dear
For I will finish your table prayer.
'Give us Lord our daily bread.
God bless us all when we are fed."

We have begun our study of birds and are making bird booklet in Art class.

Grades VI, VII and VIII

The winners in the Quick Thinking Contests we had Friday were Berenice, Gertrude, Orlene, and Adeloyd.

Congratulations!

We extend our congratulations to the Farmers Cooperative Creamery of Holt upon their accomplishments during their 26 years in business.

Roosevelt Escapes Assassin's Bullets but Mayor Cermak Is Wounded—Senate Adopts Dry Repeal Resolution by Surprisingly Large Majority.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

SHOT at five times by an anarchist in Miami, President-Elect Franklin D. Roosevelt narrowly escaped being added to the list of America's illustrious victims of assassins. Not one of the bullets struck him, but Mayor Anton Cermak of Chicago, who was talking with Mr. Roosevelt, was seriously wounded. Two other men and two women in the throng that was gathered in Bay Front park to welcome the President-Elect also were hit by the assassin's bullets and it was feared one of the women would not survive. Mr. Roosevelt had just landed after his fishing cruise, had made a brief talk to the thousands in the park and was being greeted by personal friends when the anarchist, identified as Giuseppe Zangara of Hackensack, N. J., fired at him from a distance of 20 feet. In the great excitement and turmoil Mr. Roosevelt remained calm and insisted on taking Mr. Cermak to a hospital in his car. He remained over night on the yacht Nourmahal and visited the wounded mayor next morning before leaving by train for New York.

Franklin D. Roosevelt

All the world was shocked by the attempted assassination and messages of congratulation on his escape poured in on Mr. Roosevelt, one of the first received being from President Hoover. Mrs. Roosevelt heard the news as she returned home from a club where she had made an address. Her only comment on learning that her husband was not injured was: "I am thankful." She did not change her plans, which took her next day to Utica to speak at a home and farm week celebration.

Secret service operatives in Miami said Zangara, the assassin, was a member of an anarchist group of Paterson, N. J., and that he declared he had no accomplices, acting entirely on his own initiative. Immediate steps toward his trial were taken, but the authorities were careful to avoid any possible charges that Zangara was being "railroaded."

BY THE rather surprising vote of 63 to 23 the senate adopted the revised Blaine resolution submitting repeal of the Eighteenth amendment to constitutional conventions in the states. In this form the measure is almost in accord with the plank of the Democratic platform. It provides for outright repeal except for federal protection for dry states against liquor importations.

Speaker Garner predicted the resolution would be speedily accepted by the house. The approval of the President is not required; but it must be ratified by thirty-six states.

Voting for the resolution in the senate were 33 Democrats, 29 Republicans and 1 Farmer-Laborite. Against it were 9 Democrats and 14 Republicans.

The Illinois senate passed legislation wiping out the state prohibition law and the search and seizure act.

WHILE Ambassador Sir Ronald Lindsay was starting back to Washington with the British proposals for the war debt discussion scheduled for March, Senator Key Pittman introduced a bill that would seem to have some merit, though our expert financiers may tear it to pieces. The measure would permit Great Britain to make the payment on her debt due in June in silver, and this, according to Mr. Pittman, would operate to the advantage of the United States; would enable England to avoid transfer of gold to meet the next war debt payment and would make possible acceptance by Great Britain of silver in payment of a large sum due from India before the June war debt payment.

Sen. Pittman

The Pittman bill would authorize the acceptance by this government of any sum up to $100,000,000 due from Great Britain in silver at current market value.

Its purpose was explained as follows by Mr. Pittman:

"The government of India owes Great Britain approximately $85,000,000. It has been reported with some authority that India desires to pay this debt to Great Britain with silver. The acceptance by the United States of $74,950,000 worth of silver at the world market price of silver of approximately 25 cents an ounce, which is probably lower than it will ever be again, would not only be profitable to the United States but advantageous to both the United States and Great Britain.

"Under such a settlement the United States would receive 299,800,000 ounces of silver at the present market price of around 25 cents an ounce. Under the provisions of the act our government out of such silver would coin 74,950,000 standard silver dollars. It would deposit them in the treasury and issue and circulate against them $74,950,000 in silver certificates similar to those now in circulation in the United States.

"As it requires only seventy-eight one-hundredths of an ounce of silver in the coinage of standard silver dollars, there would remain, therefore, in the treasury, in addition to such 74,950,000 standard silver dollars, 241,839,000 ounces of silver to be held in the treasury as security for the maintenance of the parity of the silver certificates so issued."

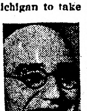
ONE of the eminent men called on to advise the senate finance committee, Dr. Herman F. Arendtz, a Boston economist, condemning any plan for "internationally managed currency," such as may be expected to be put forth at the coming international economic conference, declared that what we need is less credit and more hard cash. Silver is the salvation, in this hard money campaign, he maintained. Its remonetization would be the engine priming that would, in six months, enable America to sell to the Orient between 600 and 650 million dollars' worth of lumber, wheat, cotton and copper.

First of the advisers heard by the committee was Bernard M. Baruch, who is likely to be in the Roosevelt cabinet. He argued vigorously against currency inflation and in favor of a speedy balancing of the budget, and urged the adoption of a beer tax and the repeal of the Eighteenth amendment. He also advised the federal leasing of farm acreage to curtail production, and this plan was indorsed by C. C. Teague, former member of the farm board. Mr. Teague, asserting that the collapse of the credit structure of the country was the fundamental cause of the depression, urged federal guarantee of bank deposts, and in this he ha; the full support of Speaker Garner.

George N. Peek, a manufacturer of Moline, Ill., set forth his objections to the domestic allotment bill, which is doomed to death either in the senate or in the White House, and proposed a modification of the plan whereby curtailment of acreage would come after planting and before harvest, since "the variation in yield of all growing crops from year to year depends 75 per cent on weather and pests, largely beyond human control, and only 25 per cent on the acreage planted."

DESPITE the efforts of Brazil and other South American nations, backed up by our State department, real war has broken out between Colombia and Peru and the former country has severed diplomatic relations and declared that mediation is finished. This rupture resulted from an air attack by Peru on a Colombian flotilla on the Putumayo river which was repulsed by Colombian planes and was followed by an engagement at the town of Tarapaca, on the Brazilian border.

FINANCIAL troubles of the Union Guardian Trust company, an investment concern of Detroit, led Gov. William A. Comstock of Michigan to take the courageous step of proclaiming an eight-day bank holiday, and his drastic action received the approval and legal sanction of the legislature. The legislators also got busy at once with the enactment of measures covering the situation and bearing retroactive clauses.



Gov. Comstock

Except for the upper peninsula, which is separated both geographically and economically from the remainder of the state, the banks were abiding by the holiday order. The upper peninsula is in a different federal reserve bank district and, although the governor of the Federal Reserve bank of Minneapolis said he was keeping hands off in the situation, most banks above the Straits of Mackinac were doing business as usual.

The Federal Reserve bank of Detroit remained open and received millions of dollars from Chicago and New York, and the Detroit Clearing House association made arrangements whereby $25,000,000 was made available to depositors, the latter being permitted to withdraw not in excess of 5 per cent of their balances for emergency purposes before the expiration of the holiday. Several of the biggest Detroit corporations announced that they were continuing to pay their workers in cash, and all business concerns except the financial houses carried on as usual. The governor held conferences with Secretary of Commerce Chapin and leading financial authorities, and Mr. Comstock said he did not seek to prohibit any bank from making a sensible arrangement to permit withdrawals to meet family necessities or to allow the cashing of [illegible]

Latest News of the Work of the State Legislature Condensed for the Busy Readers

Bismarck.—With the schedule calling for completing of their duties the latter part of next week and much work yet to be done members of the legislature are face to face with a program calling for long hours of political maneuvering to disentangle themselves from the inevitable last minute swirl of legislation. Much important administration legislation is yet to be completed and in some quarters majority leaders are known to be bringing pressure to speed up action on important measures. Unless the house and senate complete their work by midnight of the last day, it will be necessary for some employees to scale the walls of the chambers and turn back the large clock hands that they may have more time to clean up their calendars before adjournment.

The senate late last week approved measures giving the governor veto power over the acts of the industrial commission of which he is chairman, and placing the state mill and elevator under the commission's supervision. Both bills, passed with emergency clauses, now go to the house.

Lack of a constitutional majority caused defeat of Senator Bonzer's bill providing for one publication of the delinquent tax sales notice. The vote was 24 to 21 for passage, but 25 votes are necessary to declare a measure passed.

Following examination of various accounts over whcih John Gammons, former secretary of the industrial commission, had supervision, discrepancies approximating $41,000 was revealed. Gammons, under arrest on two charges growing out of operations laid to him, was expected to be arraigned in district court. Investigators delved into all industrial commission accounts with which Gammons had any connection, as well as the Home Builders association and the securities commission.

Two warrants for the arrest of G. Angus Fraser, former adjutant general and until recently a member of the capitol building commission, charging him with obtaining property and money under false pretenses, were issued last week. Fraser gave himself up to the sheriff at Bismarck. Fraser and the Burleigh county sheriff are personal friends and both served through the Spanish-American war.

The house was expected to hold night sessions this week. Majority Leader Herbert F. Swett suggested the night sessions in order to dispose of bills awaiting third reading and final vote.

Senatorial approval was given a resolution to authorize a loan, not to exceed $200,000, to the Lehigh Briquetting company, Dickinson, for installation of an additional carbonizer and other equipment to "supply the demand for its briquets and to reduce its overhead charges so as to enable it to sell its briquets cheaper to the public. The vote was 39 to 9. Provision is made for payment of the loan at the rate of "at least 50 cents for every ton of briquets manufactured and sold," the entire loan to be paid within five years.

Measures slated for the "graveyard" by virtue of their being recommended by house committees for indefinite postponement include:

Members of the senate agricultural committee recommended indefinite postponement of a proposed license fee increase from $10 to $25 on a creamery, cheese, or ice cream factory, renovating or process butter factory or cream station.

A bill which would abolish the election of coroners, county surveyors, public administrators and county constables, and place their appointment in the hands of county commissioners, was brought back into the house when the vote was reconsidered and once again failed of passage for lack of a constitutional majority. The first vote was 49 to 45 and the second, with a clincher motion applied, 52 to 51.

Five bills providing sentences of whipping for certain offenses, were recommended for indefinite postponement by the house judiciary committee. They were introduced by Holtusen of Richland, where the idea originated among members of the County Taxpayers association.

Although it was reported out of the house ways and means committee for passage, a bill to permit Sunday movies was given a poor chance for favorable action by the present legislature.

A house measure designed to do away with voters guide cards was recommended for passage though this body previously voted down a senate bill providing for repeal of this law.

Slated for passage by the senate judiciary committee, is a measure providing for examination of persons charged with crime whom the court has reasonable ground to believe insane.

One dog tax bill was indefinitely postponed by the house and another from the senate seeking repeal of the present dox tag was recommended for passage.

Repeal of the law requiring assessors to gather agricultural statistics; authority for counties to pay half salaries in cash and half in warrants; an appropriation of $1350 to reimburse Traill county for prosecution of Vandiver robber of a Hatton bank; reimburse R. J. Kamplin for a law library lost in the capitol fire; establishment of a tannery at the state prison; regulations for midwives; provisions for limiting powers of officials of incorporated villages or cities in excluding farm land from city limits.

After two days of fighting waged around wording of the bill, the house passed a measure to void encumbrances upon exempt personal property unless both husband and wife agree and sign the contract. The vote was 61 to 49 but the emergency failed.

An administration bill creating a state regulatory department was approved for passage with amendments by the house ways and means committee. Among amendments was an added section whereby it becomes the duty of regulatory department employees to collect fees charged by the commissioner of agriculture and labor and attend to matters in connection with uncollected motor vehicle taxes.

The warehouse and grain grading senate committee recommended passage of a resolution memorializing congress to permit farmers to use their allowance of crop production funds for purchasing December wheat in the open market instead of growing a wheat crop this year. Those favoring the bill hope that "the surplus and probable over-production may be overcome" with its passage.

A measure approved by the senate would tell the world "North Dakota is O. K." A slogan "N. D. is O. K." would be placed on automobile license tags.

A bill proposing a tax on utrkeys was indefinitely postponed by the senate. The house did likewise on a similar bill.

Prohibiting employment of married women in state departments, boards and commissions was favored in committee and the recommendation to pass the bill approved by the senate.

Recall elections for city commissioners are a thing of the past, so far as the house is concerned. The Fitch-Johnson bill to end such proceedings under the commission form of government, passed the house 87 to 20, with the clincher motion attached to prevent reconsideration.

The new highway commissioner, whose appointment will be the result of a law passed at the present session, will be named in the near future, according to word from Governor Langer.

A bill clarifying a 1932 initiated law which prohibits corporation farming has passed the senate. One of its authors, Fowler of Cass, explained the bill clarifies the initiated law and brings out the original intent of the initiated measure. He said it makes it clear that the measure shall apply to rural lands and not city real property.

The first bill introduced in the senate this session, has passed the house and gone to the governor for his approval. It provides for easier redemption of real estate sold or forfeited to counties for taxes of 1931 or prior years, permitting redemption before Dec. 31, 1935, on payment of the original amount of the tax levied and assessed together with interest at 6 per cent—the penalties being eliminated.

Carrying an emergency clause, the bill authorizing the insurance commissioner to set up a levy for a hail indemnity tax, passed the house 103 to 3. This same house defeated the senate bill to provide a $500 appropriation for soundings and a preliminary survey of a bridge site over the Missouri river near old Fort Benton.

A measure introduced in the senate through the delayed bills committee by the judiciary committee would reduce salaries of state appointive officials similar to those provided for in the initiated law part of which has been held unconstitutional by the state supreme court.

Signature of Governor Langer will make into law a measure appropriating $200 to L. J. Wehe, Bismarck attorney, for "professional services rendered the special investgating committee" in 1919. Wehe has spent 14 years effort collecting this compensation.

Proposed in a senate concurrent resolution by Marton of Morton, the bill designed to create a one house legislature consisting of one "senator" from each county was recommended for indefinite postponement.

Senate and house committees on appropriations for educational and charitable institutions have recommended economy slashes totaling $327,381.03. More than a quarter of a million dollar cut in the budget of three state charitabe institutions as recommended by the house appropriations committee was approved by the committee of the house in the house.

As the legislators completed their work last week, ten bills were introduced through the delayed bills committees, five in the senate and five in the house.

In two measures recommended for passage in the senate, the governor's attendance would be necessary to constitute a quorum for transaction of business at industrial commission meetings and a mill and elevator bill would eliminate the three-man commission now in charge of the state-owned industry located at Grand Forks. This authority would be placed with the industrial commission.

Grand Forks.—Granison Tharp, Mandan, has been elected president of Blue Key, men's service organization at the university.

Hot Bread Adds Much to Simple Meals

One Kind Just About as Good as Another, Though They Are Generally Served at Breakfast or Luncheon—Corn Delicacies.

Nothing adds more to a simple meal, or to an elaborate one, for that matter, than a hot bread, right from the oven or griddle. Northerners do not consider these breads indispensable at every meal, as do southerners, but they like them just as well, I think, when they are offered to them.

Almost all these breads are just as good at one meal as at another, but we are more inclined to serve them at breakfast or luncheon than at dinner, although I am sure no one will turn down a hot muffin or roll with dinner. Spoon bread is a soft baked mixture which is associated with meat and gravy, as also are waffles. Personally I like corn griddle cakes as well as anything for serving with gravy, says a writer, dilating on good things to eat.

Speaking of corn, I wonder if you ever use corn sticks for dinner. They are so brown and crispy when baked in the heavy pans which come for this purpose that they are especially good throughout the meal, from soup to salad. My favorite corn griddle cake, is made without scalding the corn, and consequently has a very individual flavor and texture, in my opinion. Steamed brown bread also has a place at the dinner table, although it is particularly associated with baked beans, which, to be complete, need hot brown bread. In Boston some persons add raisins, in which case it is known by the English title of "plum bread." Others prefer it plain. This type of bread, because it is soft but firm, makes a good foundation for canapes, spread with cream cheese and garnished with sliced stuffed olives, or for a hot peanut-bacon canape.

Among muffins bran has become popular in the last few years. Bran muffins should be rather sweet. I like molasses for sweetening, and prefer sour milk to sweet for mixing. You know a tablespoonful of vinegar added to sweet milk will answer if haven't sour milk or buttermilk. Raisins or dates may be added to the batter. Sliced bananas or apples are also good in these or in plain muffins.

When I make plain muffins I do not make them so very plain. I like to use the cake method of mixing; that means that the muffins will necessarily be a little sweet. A Sally Lunn is made by using this same mixture, but by balancing it in one pan it may be sprinkled with a mixture of sugar and cinnamon before it goes into the oven.

For all of these muffins and tea cakes a moderate oven—375 degrees to 400 degrees Fahrenheit—is best. Biscuits, of course, take a hotter oven—450 degrees Fahrenheit. Griddles and waffles now may be tested by dropping a sprinkling of water on the griddle. If little balls of water roll around on the hot oven, it is hot enough. Never grease a griddle or muffin iron. Put plenty of shortening in the batter and your cakes will never stick and the utensil will not smoke and fill the house with the odor of burning fat.

When these made-at-the-table cakes or waffles are used for dessert, sirup, honey or sugar and cinnamon should be served with them. Plain cake or ginger cake mixture may be baked in waffle irons if the mixture is thinned a trifle. Whipped cream or crushed fruit served with them makes a marvelous dessert.

CORN STICKS

2 cups cornmeal
1 cup boiling water
1 teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon baking powder
¼ teaspoon soda
2 cups sour milk or butermilk
2 tablespoons melted butter

Scald two cups cornmeal with boiling water. Mix salt, sugar, baking powder and soda with rest of cornmeal and add alternately with sour milk or buttermilk to first mixture. Add melted butter and bake in a hot oven (400 degrees Fahrenheit) in hot, well-greased stick pans twenty minutes.

Diet Didn't Do This!

Every child's stomach, liver, and bowels need stimulating at times, but give children something you know all about.

Follow the advice of that famous family physician who gave the world Syrup Pepsin. Stimulate the body's vital organs. Dr. Caldwell's prescription of pure pepsin, active senna, and fresh herbs is a mild stimulant that keeps the system from getting sluggish.

If your youngsters don't do well at school, don't play as hard or eat as well as other children do, begin this evening with Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. This gentle stimulant will soon right things! The bowels will move with better regularity and thoroughness. There won't be so many sick spells or colds. You'll find it just as wonderful for adults, too, in larger spoonfuls!

Get some Syrup Pepsin; protect your household from those bilious days, frequent headaches, and that sluggish state of half-health that means the bowels need stimulating. Keep this preparation in the home to use instead of harsh cathartics that cause chronic constipation if taken too often. You can always get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at any drug store; they have it all ready in big bottles.

SYNOPSIS

Motoring through Vermont, Philip Starr, young Boston architect, meets, in unconventional fashion, Blanche Manning, girl of seventeen, with whom he is immediately enamored. In conversation, he learns something of her family history. It being a long distance to Burlington, Starr's destination, Blanche suggests, the village of Hamstead not boasting a hotel, that he become, for the night, a guest of her cousin, Mary Manning. Mary receives Philip with true Vermont hospitality, and he makes the acquaintance of her cousin Paul, recognized as her fiance. Starr finds Mary is acquainted with Gale Hamlin, noted Boston architect, in whose office Philip is employed. He informs her of his desire to win Blanche for his wife. She is sympathetic, and tells him of an old family superstition concerning the "Blanches" of the Manning family. Paul Manning is inclined to be dissipated, not realizing Mary's true worth. Mary's reproaches for his undue "conviviality" are badly received by Paul, and the girl begins to have misgivings as to the wisdom of the alliance.

She faced this fact resolutely. Paul did not love her as much as she loved him. Why—why? She almost cried it aloud. He was constantly failing her, not only by his whole idle, selfish life, but by follies such as he had committed the night before. Follies! There is little compromise of language in the speech of the average New Englander; he does not, as one writer has wittily put it, call a spade a silver trowel. The real name for such follies was sin, and Mary said it, even though she flinched in doing so. Sin! and how had she ever failed him—or anyone else—in thought or word or deed?

Mary could not help knowing that there were other men in the village who had been attracted to her, who would have been glad to make it plain that they were more than attracted, if she hadn't made it plain that no one in the world mattered to her except Paul. There was Thomas Gray, for instance, slow and plodding, but hard-working, kind and wholesome. And then—then there had been Gale Hamlin, the great architect, whose name Philip pronounced with an awe amounting almost to veneration. She had never told her family much about Hannah Adams' uncle. Her casual remarks about him had included little mention of his frequent calls at the Adams' house when she visited there, none at all of that last call, paid at the school when the news of her mother's death had come. . . .

The sharp note of a phoebe bird, singing beside her, brought Mary to the consciousness that she must have been dreaming a long time, and sent her hurrying down the hill, still undecided what she ought to do, but immeasurably, if vaguely, comforted and refreshed. Reaching the house, she slipped out of her wet garments, took a hot bath, dressed again in crisp, clean clothes, and began, a little breathlessly, to get dinner.

She need not have hurried, for everyone else was late, but as she had no means of knowing that they would be, she was both tired and ruffled when, at half-past one, she had a meal ready to serve which would have done credit to an older and more experienced cook. Violet was the first to appear, and Violet was "nervous." Mary knew it the instant she looked at her.

"Paul isn't coming to dinner," she said tartly. "You hurt his feelings very much this morning. I can't think how you can act so, especially when the poor boy is ill. I should have asked nothing better than to sit beside him the whole morning, bathing his poor aching head, if I'd only been equal to it. But then, of course, there's no love as devoted and self-sacrificing as a mother's! Though I felt the same way towards Martin. I didn't feel towards him at all the way you do to Paul. I couldn't have."

"No, I don't believe you could," said Mary, trying to control the grief and anger that seemed to be struggling for mastery in her voice. "I'm sorry he won't come—I'll take off his plate. Won't you come into the parlor now and meet Mr. Starr?"

While this meeting was taking place, very satisfactorily to both persons concerned in it, Seth Manning was sitting patiently in the family carryall outside the village church, waiting for his cousin, Jane, and his small son, Moses, to come out of Sunday school. Miss Manning, in common with her neighbors, saw nothing irreverent in using aisles and porch for a little informal visiting after the services were over. And as just at this time Children's Sunday was looming large ahead of them, there was a good deal to consider.

"I'm just as nervous as I kin be about them new-fangled exercises Mis' Weston has chosen," Mrs. Elliott was confiding to Miss Manning. "Of course, seein' she's chairman of the committee on entertainment, none of the rest of us could say a word, but it looks to me as if she'd bit off more'n she can chew. If Sylvia Gray was so's she could be around, I shouldn't worry none, but Land! have you heard? Sylvia's expectin' again, and she's real poorly. She ain't strong enough to have children so fast. I went and told her so the other day and what do you think she said? That she was real pleased, that she only hoped it would be twins, twin girls, so she'd have two of 'em, right off, to go with the two boys! She does beat everything!"

When at last the assembled family, with the exception of Paul, sat down to a repast by this time slightly overdone, Seth was hampered by the desire to avoid trouble and to please everyone all the time. Violet had come to him just before they sat down, and urged him to omit asking a blessing, for fear that Mr. Starr would think they were old-fashioned. He had agreed with her. But now he quailed before Jane's stern eye.

"For-what-we-are-about-to-receive-make-us-duly-thankful," he gulped, all in one breath, and was immediately conscious that now he had offended both his cousins, one by asking the blessing at all, and the other by his manner of doing it.

"Lemme give you some chicken, Mr. Starr," he said hastily, "which do you favor, light or dark?"

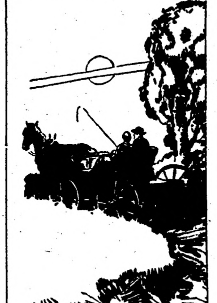
"I suppose you're not a church member?" she said with dark conviction.

Philip smiled. "Oh, yes," he said. "My father was a Congregational minister. I hadn't told you that before, had I? . . . Dark, please, Mr. Manning."

"A Congregational minister!" exclaimed Cousin Jane in amazement, while the others sat staring at him in speechless relief at his tact in introducing so exemplary a relative into their ruffled midst. "Why, I understood Mary to say that one of your grandfathers . . ."



The Slow Drive Home Was Permeated With Magic.

"—Was an Irish immigrant. Yes, he was—North of Ireland Protestant. Plumber, after he got to this country. Made lots of money when he got started to plumb—just hit the first wave in the fashion for bathrooms. He only had one child, and there was plenty of money to let him travel and study and prepare for the ministry—which was what he wanted to do—those queer freaks of heredity come sometimes, you know. He was minister for years of one of the largest Congregational churches in Massachusetts—until he died, in fact. He—he was an awfully good sort for a fellow to have for a father. My mother came from Brookline. She was another only child. And I'm another," ended Philip, less cheerfully.

"Do you mean to say," asked Blanche, with unconcealed envy, "that you haven't a cousin in the world?"

"Not one. Nor parents nor grandparents. It isn't much fun."

"Blanche wouldn't agree with you," said Cousin Jane. But her mind was still too busy with Philip's unexpected and gratifying disclosures to dwell long on the shortcomings of Blanche. "How come you not to go to church this morning, then?"

"Extenuating circumstances," answered Philip promptly, glancing at Blanche.

Cousin Jane's next remark was interrupted by a terrific clattering and banging in the room above them. Mary arose hastily, in the act of serving stewed tomatoes.

"That's only Algy," she said by way of explanation to Philip, "waking up from his nap. I'll go and dress him and bring him down."

When Algy, still pink and warm with sleep, was settled in his high chair, the ice cream was being served, and the fresh, feathery sponge cake passed about. Both were delicious. There was a comfortable silence as everyone began to eat with renewed appreciation of Mary's talents as a cook.

CHAPTER V

On Monday morning it was still raining—raining much too hard to attempt the unknown roads to Burlington. There was, Blanche added, to be one of Hamstead's infrequent dances in the town hall that evening. It was stupid for her tagging along with Paul and Mary, even when they were on good terms, and anyone could see that Paul was having one of his grouches. (Paul's "grouches" corresponded to his mother's "nerves.") And none of the boys in the village seemed to realize that she was old enough to be asked to go to parties by herself now. . . .

"Well, thank the Lord for that," said Philip piously. "I'll stay, of course."

In the afternoon it cleared, and he went to Violet, hesitating a little, and asked if he might invite Blanche to go for a little ride with him.

"Why, of course," she said delightedly. "Take one of the roads out to West Hamstead. They're very pretty and quiet. I know our fine Vermont air is going to do you lots of good. You look better already than when you came."

"I feel better," said Philip. "Thanks awfully for letting me take Blanche. I'll take good care of her."

The route which Violet had suggested was one which could easily be covered in two hours, with the old family horse, but no one seemed to think it worth a comment when Philip and Blanche, leaving the house a little before three, reappeared late for a six o'clock supper. They had come to a little lake—Silver pond, Blanche called it—and found an old waterlogged rowboat lying neglected beside it. They bailed out the water in it with a tin can, found providentially near at hand. They they rowed about the lake for a time, and finally climbed a hill back of it, where they sat and admired the view.

Philip had been laughing, off and on, all the afternoon, from sheer joy, and when Blanche told one of her little stories, with perfect artlessness, he laughed more than ever.

"It seems so absolutely peaceful here," he said. "Let's not hurry away."

"Well, we needn't, of course," replied Blanche, "if it wasn't for the dance."

"Oh yes, the dance! Will you give me every other one?"

"I think that's rather many, perhaps, don't you?" asked Blanche, flushing a little.

"Oh, no, not at all! I wouldn't dream of asking for less. It isn't done."

"Now you're laughing at me again!"

Had any man, Philip wondered, ever found a girl so unspoiled, so utterly delicious? It was difficult for him to refrain from taking her into his arms then and there; and though somehow he managed to steel himself against doing this, he reached out for the little hand that lay lightly on the extremely narrow strip of wood that separated him from Blanche, and locked his hard, lean fingers with her soft pink ones. Nothing that he had ever experienced in his life had awakened in him such a feeling of ecstasy. What tremendous—what undeserved—luck had been with him when he decided to take that swim!

"I am so glad you agree with me about the dances," he said, at last, rising reluctantly.

"But I didn't agree! Philip, how can you?"

Philip! She had already begun to forget to call him Mr. Starr. He had never known before what a wonderful name Philip was. The slow drive home was permeated with magic. Without knowing when or how he had begun to do so, Philip found that he was holding both Blanche's hands; he felt her golden head sink gently on his shoulder and rest there quiescent. The deepening dusk, enfolding them, seemed pregnant with the promise of still closer companionship, of more ardent embraces. But the prelude to these was perfect and complete in itself.

Neither the return to the farm, nor the family supper, nor the departure for the party to which Blanche had looked forward to eagerly, dispelled Philip's illusion of enchantment. Of course he got his dances. Many of the alternate ones he danced with Mary.

All on the Lady Blanche farm were sorry when Philip said good-by bright and early Tuesday morning. Blanche, to whom he had suggested a short walk through the orchard, lifted brimming eyes to his. He stooped and kissed the tears away from her lashes. Then he laid his cheek against hers.

"This isn't really good-by, you know," he whispered; and added softly, "sweetheart!"

Violet's farewell was likewise accompanied by tears, as well as by little pats and cooing sounds. Mary packed a delicious lunch, and laid a neatly folded road map with Philip's route clearly marked in red pencil, on top of his suitcase.

The day after his departure, the station agent called up Violet to tell her that there was a big box addressed to her, and marked perishable, express paid, waiting there. And, when it was promptly brought home by Seth and opened with some excitement, it was found to contain four five-pound boxes of candy, all exactly alike, but elaborately tied up with different colored ribbons. And under each bow of ribbon was slipped a card which read, "With kindest regards, and many thanks for my wonderful visit, from Philip Starr."

As Jane Manning had never had a suitor, this was the first box of candy that had ever been given to her. She tried to conceal her pleased surprise as long as she was with the others. Then she carried the box home, very carefully, and put it on her bedside table, near her Bible. It did not occur to her to open it. She drew up her rocker, and sat for a long time looking at it.

"No one but him would ever have remembered me," she said aloud, "at all, let alone sendin' me candy, at my age, and all tied up with red ribbon! . . . That nice boy!" she ended abruptly, and blew her nose hard.

The excitement aroused by the boxes of candy and the pleasant "bread-and-butter" letters which followed in their wake had hardly subsided when something even more thrilling happened. A beautiful limousine, beside which Philip's little runabout could no more have stood comparison than could Cinderella's pumpkin with the fairy coach into which it was turned, driven by a slim young chauffeur, very smart in a uniform to match the car's upholstery, drew up in front of Seth Manning's door, and a tall, distinguished-looking man of early middle age got out and asked for Mary.

Take Bayer Aspirin according to directions in package.

Drink Full Glass of Water.

If throat is sore, crush and dissolve 3 Bayer Aspirin Tablets in a half glass of warm water and gargle according to directions.

Almost Instant Relief In This Way

If you have a cold—don't take chances with "cold killers" and nostrums. A cold is too dangerous to take chances on.

The simple method pictured above is the way doctors throughout the world now treat colds.

It is recognized as the QUICKEST, safest, surest way. For it will check an ordinary cold almost as fast as you caught it.

That is because the real BAYER Aspirin embodies certain medical qualities that strike at the base of a cold almost INSTANTLY.

You can combat nearly any cold you get simply by taking BAYER Aspirin and drinking plenty of water every 2 to 4 hours the first day and 3 or 4 times daily thereafter. If throat is sore, gargle with 3 BAYER Aspirin Tablets crushed and dissolved in a half glass of warm water, repeating every 2 or 3 hours as necessary. Sore throat eases this way in a few minutes, incredible as this may seem.

Ask your doctor about this. And when you buy, see that you get the real BAYER Aspirin Tablets. They dissolve almost instantly. And thus work almost instantly when you take them. And for a gargle, Genuine Bayer Aspirin Tablets dissolve with speed and completeness, leaving no irritating particles or grittiness. Get a box of 12 or bottle of 24 or 100 at any drug store.

Ask your druggist about the recent price reduction on the 100 tablet size Bayer Aspirin.

NO TABLETS ARE GENUINE BAYER ASPIRIN WITHOUT THIS CROSS

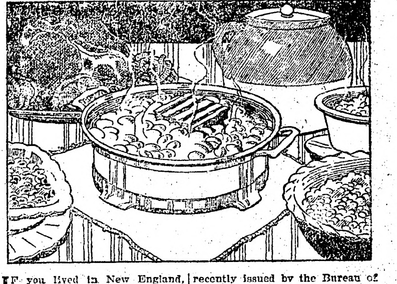
Many Kinds of Beans



If you lived in New England, not so long ago, your family wasn't considered quite respectable unless every Saturday night baked beans and brown bread appeared on the table. Whether you added molasses to your baked beans or whether you didn't, depended on whether you belong to this clan or to that clan. But, anyway, your beans were baked to four times their original size and served with squares of properly scored pork, crisp without and pinkly tender within.

A Big Bean Family

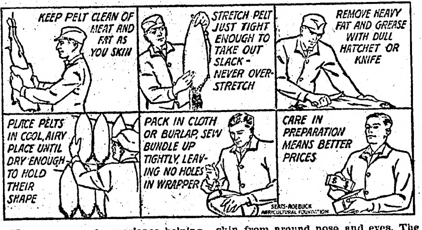
The Frenchman takes his haricots almost as seriously, and the Spaniard has even been known to become poetic about his pintos and frijoles. Strange names they are to us, who are familiar with navy beans, pea beans, green beans, wax beans, limas and lentils—but they are all in the good old bean family.

"The Economical Bean" is the title of a Market Basket bulletin, recently issued by the Bureau of Home Economics of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, emphasizing the fact that beans are a concentrated food. It states:

"Beans are plentiful even in years of drought, easy to preserve, easy to ship, easy to store; and when cooked they swell to a quantity two or three times their bulk. To use beans economically, the housewife must keep in mind two things. Beans require a long time to cook, and after cooking they will spoil unless kept cool and used fairly soon. With careful treatment, however, she can cook enough beans for three meals at one time and serve them in different ways."

The "three for a quarter" sales of canned beans which are being featured in many stores now, make them also economical, especially so when one stops to consider the cost of fuel in the long process of cooking dried beans, and the fact that there is no spoilage risk in canned beans.

JOHNNY MUSKRAT TELLS HOW TO PREPARE RAW FURS



KEEP PELT CLEAN OF MEAT AND FAT AS YOU SKIN
STRETCH PELT JUST TIGHT ENOUGH TO TAKE OUT SLACK - NEVER OVER-STRETCH
REMOVE HEAVY FAT AND GREASE WITH DULL HATCHET OR KNIFE
PLACE PELTS IN COOL, AIRY PLACE UNTIL DRY ENOUGH TO HOLD THEIR SHAPE
PACK IN CLOTH OR BURLAP, SEW BUNDLE UP TIGHTLY, LEAVING NO HOLES IN WRAPPER
CARE IN PREPARATION MEANS BETTER PRICES
SEARS-ROEBUCK AGRICULTURAL FOUNDATION

"In my years of experience helping trappers get full value for their furs," says Johnny Muskrat, broadcaster on Furs and Trapping for Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation, "I have found that a great deal of waste is caused by trappers not knowing how to prepare furs correctly. Here are a few simple directions. Follow them. The results will surprise you.

There are two methods of skinning fur bearers, cased and open. Skunk, Opossum, Mink, Muskrat, Weasel, Ringtail Cat, Otter, Civet, and Rabbit should be cased pelt side out. Wolf, Fox, Lynx, Lynx Cat, Marten, Fisher, and Wolverine should be cased fur side out. Coon, Beaver, Bear, Mountain Lion, and Badger should be taken off open.

To remove a pelt cased cut it loose around the hind feet and rip down the back of the hind legs. Peel the pelt from the hind legs carefully, skin the tail and take out the tail bone. Draw the skin downward from the body. Use a good sharp knife and scrape the pelt as clean of heavy fat and meat as possible but don't scrape too closely because if you do the fur roots are apt to be injured. A good method of skinning is to attach the hind feet of the carcass to a tree limb with strong cord or wire. This permits you to pull off the pelt very easily. After the head has been reached cut the skin from around nose and eyes. The skin is then in the form of a long pocket with flesh side out.

To take a skin off open, rip the skin down the center of the belly from mouth to tail. Also rip down the inside of the front legs and the back of the hind legs.

Pelts should be placed on stretchers immediately after skinning. Cased pelts should be stretched to their natural size and shape and open pelts should be stretched on a wall or board by tacking them flesh side out in a position which will stretch them uniformly.

After placing skins on stretchers hang them in a cool airy place to dry. Never dry a skin by the fire or in the sun. It is wrong to use salt, alum, or any preparation for curing skins. Simply stretch and dry them as they are taken from the animals.

Furs need only be dry enough to hold their shape in order to ship them, but to be perfectly safe never ship furs having heavy grease or fat on them which might cause spoilage in transit on account of warm weather. The best way to pack furs is to lay them flat one on top of the other, and wrap in cloth or burlap, sewing up the bundle tightly so as to leave no holes in the wrapper. It is never wise to wrap green furs in paper because overheating and spoilage may result.

CONGRESSMEN SEEN AS HARD WORKERS

OUTLINING legislative procedure, Robert V. Fleming, President Riggs National Bank, Washington, D. C., gave the recent convention of the American Bankers Association a description of the difficulties and problems confronting the law-makers. Mr. Fleming said in part:

"The most important part of organization of the two branches of congress is election of standing committees. There are 34 standing committees in the Senate and 46 in the House. These are the workshops of Congress and the real work of law-making is done in Committees.

"The task of legislating for 124,000,000 people is a tremendous one. Of recent years approximately 20,000 bills are introduced annually in the two Houses. Only a small percentage become law, but they must be weighed in committee, accepted or rejected, perhaps amended, reported out, and then considered on the floor.

"Lawmaking involves about 99% of hard and unspectacular work and about 1% of oratory. Few tasks appear so easy and are so difficult as enactment of sound and satisfactory legislation. Few individuals in any line of activity work harder or longer hours than the chairmen of the important committees during a session. I have great sympathy for the members of Congress whose constituents expect undivided attention to every piece of legislation in which they may be interested. From my personal observation, they earnestly and conscientiously endeavor to do all that is possible.

Public Hearings

"When a bill is introduced, referred to committee and printed, the next step, if it is a measure of considerable importance, is to conduct a public hearing. The committee makes an effort to listen to anyone who cares to be heard either for or against a measure, although witnesses are frequently limited as to time. Members of the Cabinet and other officials of the administrative departments of the Government usually testify on measures in which they are interested and furnish the committee information in executive session or otherwise.

"Due to pressure of work and the fact that it is impossible for members of Congress to be technical experts on every subject of legislation, the committees are inclined to give consideration to the merits of arguments presented in testimony and the recommendations of the Cabinet and other officials. It is therefore highly desirable, both from the standpoint of Congress as well as those affected by proposed legislation, that the latter have an opportunity to discuss frankly the effects of such legislation."

Honey in the Radiator

Honey is a year-round friend of the motorist, according to C. A. Reese, bee specialist of the Ohio department of agriculture. Reese said that in the winter honey provided a good antifreeze solution for the radiator, and that in the summer it helped to keep the radiator cool, due to its high boiling point. He pointed out, however, that while there were advantages to having honey in radiator water, there were likewise disadvantages. Honey, he said, will pass through openings too small for water, thus endangering cylinders.

For the encouragement of many he was able to add: "However, I did not budge, and, to my great content, did a great deal of business."

Trace Troubled Dreams to Prehistoric Period

When a man dreams that he is falling he never strikes bottom because his monkey ancestors who fell from their perches in the forest and failed to hook their tails over the limb of a tree during the descent never lived so that their human descendants could remember crashing to the ground. And if a man dreams that he suddenly awoke unclad in a room full of people, that, too, is a carry-over from prehistoric times, when man went about unclothed.

So believes Prof. William E. Slaght, who for a quarter of a century studied dreams. He analyzed thousands of dreams, seeking to find their origin, and generally was able to trace them either to hereditary causes, such as the monkey falling from the tree, or to some vivid experience in the past life of the dreamer.

In his "Before Adam" Jack London added that just because the dreamer woke up, even if sweating and in a fright, proved that he had survived the fall.—Pathfinder Magazine.

Scripture Proves Horse Was Known to Egyptians

The Egyptians were warriors from the beginning of their history, and had horses in numbers as early as when Joseph was laying in grain during the seven years of plenty before the coming of the famine years, for we are distinctly told that he gave out "bread for horses" (Genesis 47:17) when the people were giving everything they had in exchange for food. Jacob knew horses, too, and the troubles they were subject to when before his death in Egypt he described Dan as an adder "that biteth the horses' heels" (Genesis 49:17) referring to the serpent called the cerastes, which lurks in camel tracks on desert sand trails. The book of Exodus (chapter 14) gives us a vivid account of Pharaoh's 600 horse-drawn chariots, and his cavalry being overthrown and drowned in the Red sea.

Earliest Periodicals

The beginning of the periodical was in the Seventeenth century, when in 1646 catalogues of books were introduced. In 1655 the Journal des Scavans was printed in France, and in the same year Acta Philosophica. These might be said to be the parents of the periodical. In 1709 the Tatler was established, 1711 the Spectator, 1712 the Guardian and 1710 the Examiner. In 1762 the North Briton appeared and in 1731 the Gentleman's Magazine. It was in imitation of the latter magazine that Benjamin Franklin founded the General Magazine in Philadelphia. One of the most notable early attempts of the publication of the magazine in this country was the Pennsylvania Magazine, 1775-6. This was the joint work of Robert Aikin and Thomas Paine.

Persimmon American Fruit

The persimmon is a native fruit and grows wild throughout the eastern United States from Connecticut to the Carolinas and westward to Missouri and Arkansas. The American persimmon is a close relative of the Japanese persimmon, or date-plum, which came originally from China. This tree bears a larger and much less astringent fruit than the American species and is more tropical, having been grown successfully in southern California.

Prevent Burns

Endless suffering of small children and unsightly scars could be avoided if mothers used care in placing pans of hot liquid where children could not reach them. A campaign against burns should start in the home, asserts Dr. Stanley J. Seeger, in an article in Hygeia Magazine.

Real Beauty Matter of Form, Color and Taste

Many persons believe that to be beautiful and artistic the work of man must be expensive. Cheap things are considered tawdry and even vulgar. Articles that are useful are also barred by some individuals who consider themselves capable of judging.

Edward P. Richardson, educational director of the Detroit Institute of Arts, holds different ideas. He declares beauty to be a matter of form and color and that good design need not be expensive. To prove that his theory is correct Mr. Richardson started out with a reasonable sum of money provided by the Junior league to buy useful articles that would conform to the requirements of artistic beauty.

By visiting department stores, hardware establishments, chinaware emporiums, Mr. Richardson collected 188 different articles, not one of which cost more than 50 cents, and most of them much less, and assembled them in a corridor of the art institute where an exhibition of American painting was on view. They included tableware, glassware, curtain materials, table covers and napkins! The exhibition attracted much attention, and there was no dispute regarding the claim that the expert had proved his contention.

Pepper and salt shakers need not offend the lover of the beautiful, and cups and saucers can be decorative and at the same time have the element of utility. By keeping this fact in mind housewives can make life more pleasant. Manufacturers would do well to examine the collection made by Mr. Richardson, and if they will learn the lesson he set about to teach they will improve the standard of taste and find it profitable.—Miami Herald.

In a Nutshell

The sparrows and robins, if you give them leave to nest as they choose about your garden, will have their own opinions about your garden; some of them think it well laid out—others ill.

A Country Editor Looks at Banking

"With rents falling and unpaid, real estate does not present a happy picture. Nor does the owner of carefully selected bonds feel any happier, with a bunch of them going wrong. A lot of folks very carefully invested in preferred and common stocks in the finest companies in the world and have seen them fall to perhaps a tenth of what they paid for them, and no dividends at all. Some folks kept their money in savings accounts in banks, and some banks have closed and left them high and dry. But the situation is worth looking at very carefully.

"On government authority, most banks that closed were really solvent but for frozen assets and popular timidity. Gradually the closed banks are coming out from under and depositors in even bad cases will get at least 0 per cent of their savings. That's tough of course; nobody likes to lose half of what they had scrimped and sacrificed and saved. But when you hoard and stick the roll of bills in a coffee pot or under a mattress, some plug-ugly comes along and burns your feet till you tell him to take it and welcome.

"And what about the great majority of banks that weathered the storm, met all comers and are doing business as usual, carefully and conservatively, but safely? What about the savings in those banks? They are a full 100 per cent today—and they are the only thing we know of at 100 per cent anywhere. After all is said and done, a good, well managed bank is still the best place in all the world for money or savings. Right now in Ohio the banks pay the taxes on all savings and pay their depositors net interest on their savings. We can't think, just now, of many other investments that are a tenth as safe as a savings account in a solid bank.

Old English Saying

"What an ado they made about it," we hear. An ado is commonly understood to signify a "fuss," whether this is the nature of actual disturbance, or merely the phychological "fuss" of resentment and hurt feelings. The term doubtless owes its familiarity and its popularity in common speech to the title of Shakespeare's play, "Much Ado About Nothing." But the origin of its use in this way goes back a bit further.

It was the old English author, Thomas Preston, whose activity is dated at about 1561, three years before Shakespeare was born, who first wrote of "making an ado" in the first part of his "King Cambyses."

Incidentally, "ado" is from the Middle English "at do," which was the northern form for "to do."

National Anthem

"The Star-Spangled Banner" was made the national anthem of the United States by act of congress, signed by the President, March 3, 1931. Prior to this its only official recognition occurred nearly a hundred years after it was written, when it was formally ordered to be played in the army and navy on occasions of ceremony. Its standing was undisputed in other lands, and whenever America was honored in music this air was played.

National Horse Show

The formation of the National Horse Show of America, controlling body for the sport, came about in 1883, as the result of friendly arguments as to which man, among the wealthy group in that era, owned the best trotter, the best pacer, the best jumper, and so on. The initial show was in old Madison Square garden, New York, on October 22 to 26, 1883. The democracy of the show was evidenced by the fact that although the main idea was to settle supremacy between blooded horses, all types of horses were invited to participate.

Charcot Ranked Among "Pioneers of Medicine"

"The glamor surrounding Charcot in his lifetime obscured the true value of his work and of the man himself. . . . It is one of life's little ironies that it was his faulty work which, at the time, brought him world-wide fame and patients from every class of society, whereas his enduring, pioneer work was of such a highly technical character that none but specialists in his own field could appreciate its value." So writes Dr. Claude Lillingston in one of his word portraits of "Pioneers of Medicine" in Hygeia Magazine.

In his identification of a large group of nervous ailments with definite changes in the brain and spinal cord, Charcot attained scholarly achievement which assured him a permanent place in the ranks of great pioneers of medicine.

In the Salpetriere, a French hospital, Charcot was tossed more or less by chance to care for the insane, the epileptic and the subjects to hysteria. Such an ill-assorted crowd! Charcot had to forge new weapons, evolve new principles and new tests in an effort to do justice to his patients.

Democratic in principle, Charcot, on one occasion when a princess demanded preferential treatment, exclaimed: "This stranger does not seem to know we have taken the bastile."

Blind Find Protection in Sensation of Fear

Fear is the agency that prevents blind people from running into objects in their path, according to a bulletin of the Better Vision institute. The researches of Dr. Vladimir Dolansky, a blind Polish scientist, published in the quarterly printed for the blind in braille, proves that a sensation akin to fear affects the thousands of hair follicles which cover the face and body, says the bulletin, and causes the feeling of tingling that a blind person has when he approaches an object unexpectedly. This reflex only occurs when the blind person is not consciously aware that he is in danger. The contracting of the hair follicles is something like the bristling of a cat attacked by a dog, or of a horse which has smelled a wolf.

"These who still have the use of their eyes are without this sixth sense," continues the bulletin. "Four out of ten of them do not even have the common sense to know that their eyes themselves need assistance."

Army Mule Losing Out

The army mule, though more than holding its own in difficult country, is elsewhere fighting a losing battle against the machine age. Hard-kicking hoofs are yielding to balloon tires and the cynical bray of yesteryear is being replaced by the purr of well-oiled motors which are not subject to arbitrary balking.

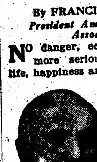
The two regiments of regular infantry forming the First brigade of the First division have been equipped with motor trucks and motor cycles, utility cars and truck trailers. And now the field and combat trains of the Sixteenth and Eighteenth infantry regiments, stationed respectively at Governors Island and Fort Hamilton, are to be motorized.

Temptation for Pepys

Black Monday was surely as nothing to the Tuesday that follows an Easter bank holiday, writes a columnist in the Manchester (Eng.) Guardian. Mr. Pepys felt the strain of it even under the easier conditions of the Seventeenth century. "To the office," he recorded on the Tuesday of Easter week, 1666, "but, Lord, what a conflict I had with myself, my heart tempting me a thousand times to go abroad about some pleasure or other."

THE TAX MENACE A GROWING CRISIS

By FRANCIS H. SISSON
President American Bankers Association



F. H. SISSON

NO danger, economic or social, more seriously menaces our life, happiness and prosperity than the rising tide of taxes which threaten to engulf us. This is not simply a problem of the depression. It has been developing for many years, growing more serious all the time. The depression merely brought it to a climax. Unless drastic steps are taken to reverse this trend the problem will not end with the depression. It will continue to weigh down and retard progress for an indefinite period.

In city, county, state and nation the orgy of spending has run on. It is estimated that in the United States the total cost of all government is nearly five times what it was before the World War. Many localities have been brought to the verge of bankruptcy by their expenditures, while many have saddled their citizens with a debt burden that will darken their lives and hamper their progress for years.

The total cost of Federal, state and local government in the United States is estimated at forty-six million dollars a day. Based on national income in 1930, this represents about one-fifth the total income of our people, or about $110 for every individual in the nation. Total taxes in 1931 are estimated to have taken more than 22 per cent of the national income. It is occasion for serious thought on the part of everyone when one day's income out of every four or five must be contributed to the maintenance of government machinery.

United States Government expenditures were reduced one hundred and forty million dollars during the first quarter of the current fiscal year. The recent action of bankers in calling a halt to unnecessary expenditures of New York City as prerequisite to loans will reduce the cost of government in the country's metropolis, which is second in its expenditures to only the Federal Government. No state in the Union, in fact, no other government on this hemisphere, spends half as much as this one city. These savings in Federal and municipal costs are only the beginning of a movement needed throughout the country, if we are to be led out of depression into prosperity.

Unless the people can be made to realize that money for governmental expenditure can come only from their own pockets as taxpayers, casting depressing effects on both individual effort and general business, there is an imminent threat that we may be forced to meet economic difficulties similar to those that have so seriously handicapped other countries.

The idea that money for these mounting extravagances can be raised by following the slogan "Soak the Rich" is utterly fallacious, for such a policy will simply exterminate "the rich" and eliminate sources of revenue. It is also important to realize that corporate business in this country is in no position to withstand the effects of indefinite advances in tax rates. Current earning reports reveal that fact beyond shadow of doubt. The tax base must be broadened, and it therefore seems likely that Congress will be called upon to reconsider the sales tax.

MORE GOOD PASTURES RIGHT THING FOR 1933

Pastures should come first in cropping plans for 1933, according to Ralph F. Crim and A. C. Arny, agronomists of the extension division and experiment station at University Farm, St. Paul. Pastures, they say, might well have received more attention from farmers in years past, but are particularly important during the present period of low prices.

That pastures are the only really cheap livestock feed is pointed out in a pamphlet on "Pasture Plants and Pasture Combinations," prepared by Crim and Arny. This is of prime importance just now with livestock prices so low. It is also pointed out that well-planned and properly-managed pastures serve to keep down the growth of weeds.

The low prices for cash grain crops is another reason for paying more attention to pastures. Converting a good share of this land to pasture will avoid a large labor investment, build up the soil and cut down the surplus of grain marketed. Other advantages of pastures are the fact that animals on pasture harvest their own feed, chores are reduced, manure is left on the land, animals have a better choice of feed and gains are cheaper.

Many excellent suggestions in the planning and management of pastures are contained in the circular, as well as suggestions on suitable pasture plants and combinations and hogging off crops. An especially helpful device, for farmers wishing to provide systematically for green feed during the whole growing season, is a chart indicating the time of year each crop or combination is most productive. Copies of this circular may be had free on request to the Mailing Room, University Farm, St. Paul.

MILK YIELDS DECIDE DAIRY COW EARNINGS

Though cows do differ, sometimes widely, in the butterfat test of their milk, by and large it is the yield of milk that tells how much profit a cow will make. This is shown in a summary of records of all cows tested in Minnesota Dairy Herd Improvement associations for 1931, tabulated by the U. S. Bureau of Dairy Industry.

The summary divides the cows into groups according to their milk yields. Cows in the group giving 2,000 pounds of milk a year cost $31 to feed and returned $6 over feed cost. Cows in the 4,000-pound group cost $39 to feed and returned $27 over feed.

As milk production increased from group to group there was a steady increase in cost of feed, but a much more rapid increase in income over cost of feed. Cows producing 12,000 pounds of milk returned $87 over feed cost, or 14 times as much as the 2,000-pound cows. In other words, when production was multiplied by 6, the income was multiplied by 14. One cow, producing 12,000 pounds, returned as much over feed costs as 14 cows producing 2,000 pounds each, to say nothing about the difference in labor and overhead expenses.

Ramer Leighton, University Farm, in charge of dairy herd improvement associations in Minnesota, says "a study of the records does not reveal proof of the oft-heard statement that a cow giving a small amount of milk will be a high tester; and, vice versa, that the heavy milk producer will have a low fat percentage. The dairyman who bases his selection solely on this belief is very apt to meet unsatisfactory and discouraging results."

Delinquent Tax List

For Marshall County, Minnesota, For The Year 1931

State of Minnesota,
County of Marshall—ss.

District Court,
14th Judicial District.

THE STATE OF MINNESOTA, to all Persons, Companies, and Corporations, who have or claim any estate, right, title, or interest in, claim to, or lien upon, any of the several pieces or parcels of land in the list hereto attached described:

The list of taxes and penalties on real property for the County of Marshall remaining delinquent on the first Monday in January, 1933, has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the District Court of said County, of which that hereto attached is a copy.

THEREFORE, You, and each of you, are hereby required to file in the office of said Clerk, on or before the twentieth day after the publication of this notice and list, your answer in writing, setting forth any objection or defense you may have to the taxes, or any part thereof, upon any parcel of land described in said list, in, to, or on which you have or claim any estate, right, title, interest, claim or lien, and in default thereof, judgment will be entered against such parcel for the taxes on said list appearing against it, and for all penalties, interest and costs.

You are further notified that at the expiration of five years from the date of the tax judgment sale pursuant to such judgment, each parcel of land sold at such sale, and not redeemed, will become and be the absolute property of the purchaser or of the State, or of his or its assigns, without further right of redemption and without any notice of expiration of the time to redeem the same.

Dated February 2nd, 1933.

A. C. SWANDBY,
Clerk of the District Court of Marshall County, Minnesota.

One Road to Happiness

For years a lovely short story of Frances Hodgson Burnett's, "The Land of the Blue Flower," has been a favorite of mine. Even though we look over snow banks to a white landscape, hope tells us spring will be swinging towards us in a few weeks more ,and so this is just the time to review the story.

A prince was removed from the kingdom soon after birth and was brought up by a wise old man high up on a mountain side. When the prince became of age and returned to become the ruler of his kingdom, he was much distressed with evidences of poverty, greed, hatred, and other evils. After carefully thinking over the problem, he decided to give each person a little bag of seeds, each person to plant and care for his own seeds. Days, weeks, and months went by, with more, changes in the people themselves than in the landscape. Interested in growing things, rejoicing in beauty, charmed by their own part in bringing it about, a happy joyous people with a community consciousness developed.

Do read the story and be sure to read between the lines.

Let's plant flowers and transplant native shrubs and trees, and so make Minnesota lovelier than ever this summer, and, at the same time, have the children feel proud of the home place, even if it is old, if it is mortgaged, and if the family income is at the vanishing point. Will you do it?—Julia O. Newton.

Squash for the Main Dish

The New York Extension Division suggests squash goulash, or squash and apples, for a cold winter's day. For the squash goulash:

1 large onion
3 slices of bacon
2 cups canned tomatoes
green pepper
salt and pepper.

Combine with the squash which has been cut in thin, cross-wise slices. Put in a buttered baking dish, cover, and cook slowly until it is tender.

To scallop winter squash and apples, put one cup of squash in a buttered baking dish. Cover with one-fourth cup of brown sugar and one-half teaspoon of salt, topped off with two tablespoons of butter. Place over this the remaining one cup of squash, three-fourths cup of apples and one-fourth cup of sugar, and dot with two tablespoons of butter. Bake for one hour in a moderate oven at about 350 degrees Fahrenheit. To dress up this dish, garnish with a few marshmallows added just five minutes before the scalloped squash is removed from the oven. This will give the marshmallows time to puff up and brown slightly. To balance the meal, serve with a salad of prunes and cottage cheese and whole wheat bread.—Inez M. Hobart.

Make Home Grounds Beautiful

Six thousand feet up the slopes of Mt. Haleakala, Hawaii, among the lava rocks and disintegrated lava sand, are found scattered cottages surrounded by flowers. These cottages are the homes of native Hawaiians and are far above the line of occupation of the average island dweller. The native Hawaiian feels cramped—hedged in by orientals and other races now making the Islands their home, and seeks out the more remote valleys or mountain slopes for his home site. But never does he locate where it is impossible for him to surround himself with flowers,—roses, lilies, and many other tropic species. Flowers are a part of every Hawaiian's life—he cares for them, he lives with them, he loves them.

This love of beautiful surroundings is a human trait. It adds to the joy of living. You miss much if you neglect it. It is time now to be planning for the beautifying of your home's surroundings. You will find pleasure in planning through the remainder of the winter, and then pleasure in planting when spring comes.—Eva L. Blair.

Decries Association of Toads and Love Making

The toad, innocently enough on its own part, poor creature, has always enjoyed a grand role in all the arts and rites of sorcery and superstition. It has ever been an indispensable ingredient in love philters and other condiments of the magician, and no witchery or incantation has ever been able, very successfully, to get along without its toads. Though this animal is as a matter of fact one of the least prepossessing and most repellant found on the earth, its very preeminence in grotesqueness has given it a charm and popularity which can only be accounted for in the natural depravity of human impulse. If there were any beast, bird, fish or reptile less endowed with esthetic factors, you may be sure that it would have been preferred to this batrachian.

For our part, however, if we find it impossible to inveigle the affections of a young lady without recourse to medications associated to a greater or less extent with extracts and essences of toads, frogs and other uncouth, however interesting saurians, we will cheerfully surrender all hope of winning the girl of our dreams. We would not care to accept, upon such terms, even Cleopatra, or Helen of Troy!—Le Matin (Paris).

Ancient City of Gaza Strong Military Point

Old Gaza, the great city of Palestine, which was well known to Abraham, was one of the most strongly fortified in the ancient world.

Sir Flinders Petrie, the veteran archeologist, announced, a short time ago, the discovery of another secret passage leading out into the desert.

So great is the area still to be explored in Gaza that Sir Flinders estimates that it will take 50 years to excavate it all.

The elaborate defenses of the city, which was in its heydey at the time of Abraham, are so complicated that military experts with the expedition did not fully understand them.

A great tunnel leading from inside the city, under the walls and nearly 500 yards out into the desert, was found. This was considered to be a means of escape in emergency, or a method by which a surprise attack could be made on besieging forces.

Further excavations of the main gate revealed another tunnel cut in the solid sandstone.

Aviator's Thrill

There is the story of an airplane pilot who went looking for trouble. Up in front of him loomed a giant thunderhead. He thought to himself, "I should like to see what is inside." As soon as the pilot got into the cloud he felt his heart sinking into his shoes as if he were being shot upward in an elevator. He was elevated at the alarming rate of 1,400 feet a minute. He pushed the control stick forward as far as it would go. It made no difference; he was still being carried upward and—to make matters even worse—sideways at a speed of some seventy miles an hour. Eventually his experience came to an end; for he suddenly shot out of the cloud in a dive, yet several thousand feet higher than when he had entered it.—Literary Digest.

Make Apples Blush

By turning the ultra violet rays of a mercury lamp on green apples, using a filter of some special glass, the Boyd-Thompson institute of plant research has been able to speed up the action of the sun and turn the green fruit into a beautiful red color in 40 to 96 hours without burning or overheating. In other words, the fruit is colored quickly by improving on the sun's methods. If the peel is too old or crushed no color results, as Dr. John M. Arthur, in charge of this investigation, found that only living cells of the apple will respond to this treatment.

Plymouth Brethren

The sect known as the Plymouth Brethren was founded by an Irish clergyman, Dr. John Darby, in 1827. The headquarters were made at Plymouth, England, whence the name. Missionary effects were highly successful in Switzerland, Germany, Italy, France and the United States. The doctrine, besides being evangelical, believes in predestinarianism and millenniumism, and the body does not believe in a ministry set apart, believing all men are equal in matters of faith and doctrine.

Moderation Best

Honey is delightful; but too much breeds choler and disease. Fragrant flowers are sweet to smell, and, moderately used, refresh the brain, but excess causes headache. Light is pleasant to the eyes, but too much staring into sunbeams dazzles or blinds them. Moderate joys and delights are ever best, least hurtful, most contentful, and comfortable to our spirits, whereas intemperance, immoderateness and excess mar all pleasures and delight, though themselves never so pleasant and delightful.—Spencer.

Old "Chained Libraries" Preserved in England

Ever since there have been books there have been book thieves. And in medieval times, when books were rare and valuable, libraries took no chances with would-be "borrowers," but chained their volumes and manuscripts securely to their shelves.

Several of these "chained libraries" still exist in England, but among them the one at Hereford cathedral is unique in several ways.

It is definitely one of the oldest—it is still a moot point whether it dates from 1394 or 1590—and with its nearly 1,500 tethered volumes is by far the largest of the chained libraries.

One of the largest of the other chained libraries in England is, as it happens, also at Hereford, in the Church of All Saints there. It has 813 chained books. But in Hereford cathedral upward of 450 books never had been unchained, and more than 1,000 chains which had been taken off books in the last century were suspended from the ceiling in rows. Moreover, by a piece of great good fortune, the brass clips by which the chains had been fastened to the books had been thrown into an old box and so preserved. Consequently, it has been possible to rechain all the books in the library almost precisely as they were originally.—New York Times.

Old Methods Employed by Viking Fishermen

Fishing is now one of the most highly organized industries in the world. But although everything has been "speeded up" and mass production methods are used for catching fish, progress has not killed the old long-line fishermen of the Scandinavian countries. These Vikings, direct descendants of the reputed discoverers of America, go to sea in vessels about the size of a trawler. On the fore deck there is a small engine, worked by steam and about the size of a typewriter. This is a set of spools for winding up the line. The twine they use is no thicker than the string shop assistants use for tying up parcels, but it is strong and there are miles of it on the spools. At intervals all along the line there are long strings branching off, and at the end of each branch a hook, baited with a bit of fish. The number of hooks on one line may be anything from a thousand to five thousand. The bait used are generally mussels, whelks, squid and herrings.

Modernism's Beginnings

We call those things modern which are widely characteristic of our contemporary western type of civilization. The things which make modern times modern are in general those which distinguish our day from medieval Europe. Feudal government gave way to national states, the unity of medieval Christianity was broken by the Protestant reformation. Europe began to expand overseas, a new interest developed in science, serfdom disappeared, a new world commerce developed, the Renaissance put new vigor in art and literature. Printing was invented. Since these movements took place in the latter Fifteenth and in the Sixteenth centuries, it is usual to think of these years as marking the transition to the modern period so far as western Europe is concerned.—Chicago Tribune.

Sublimity

If you can make the world stare and look on, there you have vanity or compassion to support you; but to bury all your wretchedness in your own mind, to resolve that you will have no man's pity, while you have one effort left to procure his respect, to harbor no mean thought in the midst of abject poverty; but at the very time you are surrounded by circumstances of humility and depression, to found a spirit of modest independence upon the consciousness of having always acted well—this is a sublime act which, though it is found in the shade and retirement of life, ought to be held up to the praises of men, and to be looked upon as a noble model for imitation.—Sydney Smith.

Sensitive Organs

Our sense organs are responsive to almost incredibly minute stimulations. The sensory surface of the nose is affected by vanillin, one part by weight in 10,000,000 parts of air, and by mercaptan 1/23,000,000 of a milligram in a litre of air. And as for sight, there is evidence that the eye is sensitive to 5/1,000,000,000,000 erg, an amount of energy which is 1/3,000 of that required to affect the most rapid photographic plate.—The Wisdom of the Body, by Walter B. Cannon.

Fish "at Home" on Land

Fishes known as mud-skippers that are found along the coasts of the Indian and Pacific oceans are nearly as much at home on land as in the water. When they are stranded on the sands by receding tides they get over the ground in remarkable fashion. By means of their highly developed pectoral fins they jump about and climb up on rocks and other elevated objects in search of insects. These they catch on the wing by jumping at them as they pass by.

THE WAY TO JUDGE

FRANK MARSHALL

"You can judge a girl by the way she receives a kiss."

"Nay, nay—by the way she gives it back."

O. K. WITH HER

Cholly—You know, Miss Sharpe, the biggest fool usually marries the prettiest girl.

Miss Sharpe—O. K. with me. Where's the ring?

DIFFERENT BACKS

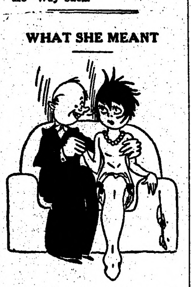
She—What are you in the college eleven?

He—Half back.

She—What are you in your studies?

He—Way back.

WHAT SHE MEANT



She—I've been reading an awful lot of books lately.

He—Why don't you girls read nice books?

DON'T UNDERSTAND

Jack—Men understand women pretty well.

Jill—Yes, all except two kinds.

Jack—And what may they be?

Jill—The bachelors and the married men.

Mystery Story

This was in the days when motor cars were new, and automobiling was an adventure, not a pleasure. The family all had set out in the new car for a long trip of 15 miles, and mother was getting quite nervous as they bowled along. They stopped at an inn for lunch, and when they started again father noticed a noise in the motor.

"Good land! The engine's missing," he exclaimed. Mother's worst fears were realized, and she sputtered:

"Now, who could have taken that?"

No Positive Proof of Mankind's Original Home

The mere fact that primitive types of mankind have been found as far apart as Java, England and China means that these three divergent descendants of some common ancestor had already wandered to the extreme limits, east and west, of the great continental land mass after they had become differentiated in the process of their evolution. Hence the fact of their world-wide wanderings indicates that none of these three places necessarily has any relationship at all to the place of the original home of mankind.

Ten years ago there was found in Rhodesia the fossilized skull of a primitive type of man which may have survived in this part of the world until comparatively recent times; but whether the actual example of Rhodesian man whose remains were found in the Broken Hill mine is ancient or modern, he certainly represents an extremely primitive type of the human family, possibly near akin to the Heidelberg man whose jaw was found in Germany in 1907. This bizarre member of the human family is definitely distinct from all other known types of extinct man.—New York Times.

What, Wedding Without Single Comic Feature!

The movie comedy director was sitting in the front row at his friend's wedding. He was in a bad humor, for not a single usher was inebriated, and the organist did not have an Adam's apple that would have been funny in a close-up. The bride entered sedately, and the groom and best man made their way without mishap. The director began to writhe. The bride wore a peach of a long veil, but no one stepped on it. One laugh after another spoiled! Even the minister failed, and held the prayer book right side up.

It was getting unbearable. And when the best man reached for the ring and found it in the first pocket, without fumbling, the director could stand it no longer. Quite forgetting himself, he leaped up and in a voice of rage shouted: "Do that over! Where do you think you are—in a church?"—Kansas City Star.

Petrarch in Literature

Petrarch lived in the Fourteenth century in the early days of the Italian Renaissance, and is remembered for the sonnets which he wrote in Italian and for his influence in reviving interest in classical antiquity. To the men of the Middle ages this life seemed important chiefly as a preliminary period of trial before the day of judgment, and man's chief concern here was supposedly seeking salvation. Petrarch shared the intellectual curiosity and the delight in being alive that was common in the writers of Greece and Rome. Interest in this present life came to be a prominent characteristic of the Renaissance and of the generations since. It is because of his departure from the medieval ideals that Petrarch is now thought of as modern.

Wonderful Private Library

The Morgan library stands at the rear of the residence of J. P. Morgan in New York city. It is of white marble, of classic design and has noteworthy bronze doors of Sixteenth century Italian workmanship. The library is not open to the public, but admission may sometimes be obtained by means of a letter to the librarian. There are many valuable collections in the library, notably the Bibles, which include the Gutenberg Bible and a Syrian Bible of the year 750. Other important works are the Ashburnham Gospels, the Golden Gospels, the Naples Offices, and a prayer book of Charles VIII. There is also a unique collection of English manuscripts.

Blood Pressures

Every person has two blood pressures, a high and a low. When the doctor informs the patient concerning his blood pressure, he gives him the figure for the higher pressure, called the systolic. In a normal young man, the systolic pressure would be between 110 and 120 mm. of mercury. A normal person of twenty years should have a systolic pressure of approximately 120. For each increase of one year, the pressure goes up half a millimeter. For example, a person forty years old should have a pressure of 130 mm. Since each case of high blood pressure demands individual diagnosis, only a capable physician can treat it.—Hygeia Magazine.

Protection in Chairs

Early medieval chairs were really small chests with removable backs and armpieces, writes Estelle H. Ries in "Mother-Wit." Later these became permanent parts and were usually very high at the back and deep at the sides. This was not for ornamental purposes, but for protection against drafts. Such a form was essential to comfort in medieval dwellings in northerly climates, whether cottages or castles, for their crude structure and ill-fitting doors and window casings did not keep out the gusts of wind that blew through every crevice.

Are YOU a well-informed person?

In every issue this newspaper is filled with news. And our experience is that the news which interests you most is the news which effects you most. When one of your friends has participated in a minor accident, you are more interested in that than in a major accident in another city.

Advertising, too, is news of the first importance. It affects you. It is intimate, local news addressed to you. It deals with your comforts, your pleasure and your business. It saves you time by telling you where the merchandise is. It saves you money by announcing fair prices. It is the guide to efficient spending. When you fail to read the advertisements, you do not keep up with news that is most important to you. You miss many opportunities.

The best-informed people are those who read the advertisements regularly. In fact, in this modern age, you cannot ignore the advertisements in your newspaper and still be well-informed!

The Bank Holiday

The present bank holiday was forced upon Minnesota by the action of other States, and in no way reflects upon the solvency of Minnesota banks.

To meet the needs of commerce, Minnesota banks customarily have considerable balances on deposit in Chicago and New York, as well as in many other cities, while banks of these cities have considerable balances on deposit in Minnesota.

With banks in New York and Chicago closed, and Minnesota banks open, the outside world have promptly withdrawn all its Minnesota deposits to meet its emergency currency needs, while Minnesota banks would have been powerless to protect their cash reserves by calling in their own balances deposited outside the State.

This would have been palpably unfair to the local depositors of Minnesota banks, and it was for their protection that K. K. Solberg, Lieutenant Governor, courageously decreed a brief bank holiday, which commenced last Saturday.

It should be borne in mind that this holiday is in no sense a moratorium, but merely an interruption of business. When and as the New York and Chicago banks will have their affairs in shape to resume cash payments to depositors, there will be automatically eliminated the danger of unfairly exposing the cash reserves of the Minnesota banks, ample for normal purposes, to the currency demands of more than thirty other States and payments here will be promptly resumed. Meanwhile the banks of this State—including those that are able and willing to remain open—may pursue no other course than to obey the Lieutenant Governor's mandate.—Minneapolis Journal.

Since the closing of all banks in the United States Saturday by order of President Roosevelt, the Secretary of the U. S. Treasury has ordered the banks to open here and to take in only cash on new special deposit accounts on which you can check at once, and to make change but not to operate or draw on the regular accounts that were in the banks at the time they were ordered closed.

The Flavor of Butter

Butter has a flavor all its own—smooth, delicate, meltingly delicious.

One of the surest ways of making foods savory and palatable, is to use plenty of butter in their preparation.

Use butter, on the table,
In cooking, frying, and roasting,
In seasoning meats, fish and vegetables,
In making pies and all kinds of cakes,
In desserts, puddings and sauces,
In candy, sweets, and delicacies.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN The Safety Man

Through the noise of the rumbling traffic came the screams of a terrified mother. Her child had been added to the toll of auto accidents. The driver of the car had been drinking. An innocent life snuffed out by a "Driving Fool."

Laws in most states require that the driving license be removed when this condition exists. That law should be enforced to the letter. I also recommend a prison sentence in addition to a removal of license. The drunken game of automobile driving has gone too far.

Many drunken drivers have been fined and warned not to do it again. Think of it! A drunken driver running up and down the streets and highways and endangering the lives of people, set down with only a fine. Stop him! Send him to prison. It's the only answer.

Let us remove this type of reckless driver. Let us make the highways safe for our children.

Johnnie Doran On Sick List

Johnnie Doran who underwent an operation at the St. Lukes hospital in Thief River some time ago for a ruptured appendix is reported to be improving quite well. He was so low last week that a blood transfusion was necessary to pull him thru.

Check Up on This

The Red Cross sent up thirty-five sacks of flour last week to be distributed among those who were allotted free flour earlier in winter. The village sent in a list of only those whom needed the flour and do not get any more than the list calls for. But, they also act as distribution agency to the nearby townships.

Therefore, we take to this means of reminding the officials of our neighboring townships that they should get busy and go out and check up on the needy families who need flour and send in their names to the local county chairman so that they may get flour in the next shipment when it comes. It has not failed yet that when the flour comes to the village, that there has not been some poor family come in and asked for flour and none was allotted them.

It is up to each townboard to investigate and send in the name of each needy family and, if they do not do so then, send in your own request direct to the county Red Cross chairman and you may get some action. The village officials are getting tired of trying to explain this simple matter for the town boards.

Annual Township Election

The annual township elections will be conducted thruout the county Tuesday, March 14. The Holt township will hold theirs in the Pioneer school.

These whom have filed their names with T. B. Folden, town clerk, are ~~Carl Lindholm~~, supervisor for 3 years; Oliver Grondahl, assessor; Carl Johnson, treasurer.

He has not yet been able to get his new fixtures installed but expects to have his new ice box, counters and everything else in tip top shape by the end of this month.

The Banking Holiday

Following action of the Federal Reserve Banks, Lieut. Governor Solberg declared a Banking Holiday, in effect March 4, 1933.

Banks have since been placed under the control of the U. S. Secretary of the Treasury, who will issue rulings from time to time as how banks may operate.

We cannot exceed this authority. We appreciate the co-operation of the community.

English Farmers Defy Collectors of Tithes

To defend themselves against seizure of stock following nonpayment of titles, several hundred farmers in the Kent district of England have organized themselves into an army. They are working along war lines, and when three large trucks were sent recently to collect at ten farms the representatives of the law were routed without any of the 89 lots sought. A body of men is kept on farms where seizures may be attempted, and a small army is stationed in the village square ready to hasten to any farm when the signal, the firing of rockets, is given.—Montreal Herald.

SYNOPSIS

Motoring through Vermont, Philip Starr, young Boston architect, meets, in unconventional fashion, Blanche Manning, girl of seventeen, with whom he is immediately enamored. In conversation, he learns something of her family history. It being a long distance to Burlington, Starr's destination, Blanche suggests, the village of Hamstead not boasting a hotel, that he become, for the night, a guest of her cousin, Mary Manning. Mary receives Philip with true Vermont hospitality, and he makes the acquaintance of her cousin Paul, recognized as her fiance. Starr finds Mary is acquainted with Gale Hamlin, noted Boston architect, in whose office Philip is employed. He informs her of his desire to win Blanche for his wife. She is sympathetic, and tells him of an old family superstition concerning the "Blanches" of the Manning family. Paul Manning is inclined to be dissipated, not realizing Mary's true worth. Mary's reproaches for his undue "conviviality" are badly received by Paul, and the girl begins to have misgivings as to the wisdom of the alliance. Starr's disclosure of the fact that he is the son of a Congregational minister, and of his financial standing, establish him in the Manning family's regard.

It was, unfortunately, Moses who answered the rap at the knocker. His mouth was full of stolen sweets—he had eaten up almost the entire contents of Mary's box of candy—and he had no eye for style. He was not impressed by the appearance of the strange man. Moreover, his own appearance could hardly have warranted the hope that he might create a favorable impression himself. The day being warm, and Mary otherwise occupied, he had surreptitiously removed most of his clothing—in fact, everything except a pair of ankle ties, which had no connection with modesty and were retained simply because the hemp carpet in the front hall was rough.

"Hello," he said.

"Er—hello," said the stranger, his face twitching slightly. "Does Miss Mary Manning live here?"

"Mary? Yes. She's out in the back garden, killing potato bugs . . . that way," said Moses, with a wave of the hand, indicating the direction which the stranger should take.

"Thank you very much," said the man, his mouth still twitching, walking off in the direction indicated.

Mary, hearing footsteps, straightened up quickly from the task over which she was bent, and turned a deep crimson.

"Mr. Hamlin!" she exclaimed, in great confusion. "Oh, you must excuse me! When did you come?"

"Just now, from Boston," he said, laughing and shaking hands. "I understand you are more cordial to guests from that locality than you once gave me to understand you were likely to be. I have had the pleasure of—er—meeting one of your small brothers, and he told me I should probably find you here. Aren't you glad to see me?"

"Moses! Oh, what dreadful thing was he doing this time? Yes, of course I am, but—" her flush growing deeper every minute.

"This time I came because Philip Starr asked me to. Naturally, I didn't tell him how glad I was of an excuse. He thinks I'm doing it entirely out of friendship to him—only, it's great luck, for me, that he happened to fall in love with your cousin. It'll get Hannah and me into touch with you again—Philip is a young man of unusual thoroughness, promptness and decision, as you may have gathered in your glimpse of him—qualities which, unfortunately, are not often found in one who is also an artist and an idealist. Moreover, he possesses a very fine sense of honor. He seems to be in a tremendous hurry, but didn't think it right to press his suit until he had been more thoroughly introduced. I was instructed that as soon as this formality, through me, had been accomplished, I was to telegraph him at Burlington, and he would return here—unless, of course, it seemed absolutely hopeless for him to do so."

"Is there any reason why it should be hopeless?"

"None in the world."

"Then come over and meet Cousin Violet."

"All right," replied Gale Hamlin with twinkling eyes. "But remember that afterwards I'm coming back here to see you!"

* * * * * * *

Two days later, Philip stood in the white-paneled north parlor of Violet Manning's house, waiting for Blanche to come down to him. The room was unlighted, and it was beginning to grow dark.

The door opened and Blanche came in. Philip took a step towards her, and held out his arms. She walked straight into them.

"Lady Blanche—you little white flower—Oh, my darling!" was all he said, and covered her lifted face with his kisses.

CHAPTER VI

Philip Starr would never have dreamed of considering his comfortable income a fortune. But it loomed large in the eyes of Lady Blanche farm, and soon in those of all the country side, for in the general rejoicing at the good luck which had befallen Blanche, it was augmented—consciously or unconsciously—by many persons. Violet herself was largely responsible for this. She went about among her neighbors scattering her good news as she went.

"Of course, Blanche is very young, and it breaks my heart to think of parting with her," she said, sighing and wiping away a few tears. "But I couldn't bring myself to stand in the way of the true happiness of one of my children for selfish reasons. That's never been my way. Of course Blanche is too innocent about worldly things and too much in love to think of the material side at all, but we older ones know that can't be overlooked altogether. Philip can do everything for her. Yes, her ring is lovely, isn't it? You seldom see such pure, white diamonds. And he's given her a pendant, too—a diamond star! Wasn't that a pretty thought, and so clever! Philip is clever, unusually so. He says the name she's going to have, Blanche Starr, is a poem just in itself. No, Philip won't hear of a long engagement, so I'm going to take Blanche to Boston right away, to buy her trousseau, and see caterers and stationers and so on. I guess I can show his fashionable friends that I know how things should be done, even if I do live in the country!—They're going to California on their wedding trip—of course Philip would have taken Blanche to Europe if this tiresome war hadn't been going on. Blanche is going to keep a maid, and have a motor, right from the beginning. Of course, all Philip's friends—and he has thousands of them—will entertain for her and give her a beautiful time. Philip is charming, and that's so rare in a man! He is so thoughtful and pleasant always. I simply adore him myself. . . ."

There was not a single flaw in the crystal. Violet could purr on for hours. In fact Hamstead grew a little tired of so much perfection and so much purring.

Nevertheless, in spite of some expressions of disparagement, Mrs. Elliott and all Hamstead with her, flocked to see the trousseau, and then the presents, and, in early August, to the wedding. During the two months and a half that had elapsed since his first appearance there, Philip had spent every Sunday and holiday at Lady Blanche farm, and, as Mrs. Elliott said, had been so "pleasant-spoken" that he had become cordially liked in the village; and, in turn, he had come to have a very warm and real affection for many of his new friends and relatives. Only twice had his dream of perfect happiness been shaken; and he tried to dismiss both of these episodes from his mind as trivial.

Left alone for a time one rainy morning, he had decided to explore the little, abandoned law office. He had been thinking what fun it would be to restore it, and put it in order for Blanche and himself to occupy when they came to Hamstead to visit. It contained a cellar and two large, semicircular rooms, one above the other, and a small one with a little attic over it in the rear. He sat in one of the dilapidated chairs, pulled up a shaky table, and drew plans and sketches. Under his swift pencil, the tiny place became transformed. There was the living room, bright with white paint and a landscape paper, and shining brasses, with Lady Blanche's portrait over the mantel, her desk in one corner, her harpsichord in another, and her gate-legged mahogany table in the center of the room; there was the chamber, with her four-posted bed—one of her hand-woven linen sheets serving for a counterpane—her bureau with its crystal lusters for Blanche, her low-boy for his own dressing table, her long gilt-framed mirror, and the sampler she had stitched, on the flowered walls, instead of pictures.

He spent a long time over his pleasant task. Then, finding that Blanche, who had promised to join him there, was still nowhere in sight, he picked up some of the musty books lying on the table, and began to look through them.

They were mostly law books, with a few interesting marginal notes that the second Moses Manning had made; but Philip knew little or nothing about law, and did not understand them. The third volume that he opened, less bulky than the others, proved to be a county history, written by a local clergyman early in the Nineteenth century. The Connecticut valley had been settled by men of no slight caliber, and their subsequent Revolutionary record was noteworthy. Philip read on with increasing interest, which grew greater still when he reached that portion of the history devoted mainly to the Manning family. Here were Moses Manning's fine war service—the trip to France—and here, too, was the Countess Blanche! The story of the great chests that came over the sea. And, at last, came the date of the twins' birth, and, a few pages farther on, that of Lady Blanche's death. But between these dates was something that Philip had not yet heard.

". . . And the Lady Blanche, being very weak after her long travail, was sorely spent, for she was a female elegantly formed, but not sturdy, or of sound health. She lay in great pain, and ever and anon she sank into a stupor from which none could rouse her, nor did she regard my exhortation, or the lamentations of her afflicted husband. But suddenly she did speak in a loud voice, saying, 'Since I must die, neither shall any other woman in this village who beareth twins survive her cruel labor; and though I perish, there shall be, in every generation, a Blanche Manning on this farm, who shall have not only my name, but in whom my person shall also be seen again. And she shall wed for love, being hotly wooed, even as I was wooed, by a stranger. But because I have suffered, for all my love, in this unfriendly, cold country, and because he who swore to love me best has not saved me from anguish, but hath shown his love to be but selfishness, since he hath failed me when I most did need him—therefore, I say, she shall not love for long. Within five years of her marriage either she or her husband shall die, and die with the bitter knowledge that neither riches nor passion nor high romance, nay, not even all three together, suffice to make that great thing called love unless there be other things, which my lover hath not given me, added unto them. And, in the hour of their death, I will appear unto those who die, and comfort them, for the manner of their passing shall be lonely and grievous altogether.'

"And thereat," went on the chronicler, "she lay back upon her bed in peace, and did not speak again. And we marveled greatly that one so gentle should seek, in her last moments, to lay a curse upon her innocent descendants."

Philip closed the book, shivering, and angry and ashamed because he was shivering. That silly old superstition—what did it amount to! But—had it amounted to anything? He began, involuntarily, to recall the histories of other members of the Manning family. The countess' girl-twin—the second Blanche—had married a Virginian, a classmate of her brother's at Harvard, who was shot, after they had had only a few radiant months together, in a duel with the man who had once been his best friend. The lawyer, Moses, had a daughter named Blanche, who went west in a prairie schooner on her honeymoon, and was never heard of again after she passed the Alleghenies. And the lawyer's eldest son had a daughter who—but that story was too dreadful, and contained shame as well as tragedy. Feeling as if his throat were being clutched, and as if he could not shake himself free of the hand that choked him, Philip sprang to his feet to see an apparition standing in the doorway.

Blanche also had been spending her time that rainy morning by making an excursion into the past. Her mother had felt it a good opportunity for them to go through some of the chests carefully stowed away in the attic in search of treasures to add to her trousseau and they had found a tiny iron-bound trunk, thrust far under the eaves and forgotten, full of the countess' clothes; Blanche had carried them down to her bedroom and tried them on. They fitted her as if they had been made for her.

"Couldn't I keep one of them on, and surprise Philip?"

"I think it would be lovely! And you can do your hair like hers in the portrait, and wear that white brocade dress that she had it painted in—you'd be the living image of her!"

Accordingly, after a careful study of the famous picture, Blanche did her hair, with Violet's help, high on her head, powdered it, laced herself into the stiff, magnificent gown that had been the countess' wedding dress, and went out to join Philip.

The startled, almost terrified cry that escaped him when he saw her frightened her almost out of her senses. She ran to him, and put her arms around him, trembling, too.

"What is it?" she exclaimed. "Oh, Philip! What's the matter?"

"Nothing—nothing. . . . How lovely you look! . . . Are those some of the first Blanche's clothes?"

"Yes. Don't you think they're pretty?"

"Beautiful, darling. You—you're very like her, aren't you? Like her picture, of course, I mean."

"Yes—but I don't see why you seem so upset, even if I am. I thought it would please you to see me dressed up like this!"

Philip forced a laugh. "I'm not upset," he said pleasantly. "You startled me a little, that's all. You're—you're enough to startle any man, you're so lovely. I want a kiss—and I want to consult you about something. . . ." And then he told her of his scheme for fixing up the little office.

To his surprise, she did not respond to him with enthusiasm. At first she looked a little bored. Then she interrupted him with a petulance which shocked him.

No Santa Claus for the Grownup

A prominent minister the other day deplored the sort of faith that believes in a "wonder-working God"—that expects miracles. I believe he meant that it is a cheap sort of faith because it makes things easy for the one who believes. It lifts the responsibility for life right off one's shoulders and places it upon one's faith.

This seems to me a strikingly revealing point, which, aside from the religious reference, is applicable to much in our daily lives.

There is the tremendous faith of some of us in our friends—which is blasted at the first suggestion of disappointment or disillusionment.

And the faith in an idea—in its perfection—until it strikes the first snag in the process of working out.

And the faith of some people in themselves—until they find the first job that is too big, when they lose all self-confidence.

That sort of faith is like a child's faith in Santa Claus. He believes because he wants to believe. To get what he wants he needs only to pin a letter to his stocking the night before Christmas. It's up to Santa to work the miracle.

But for us grownups there is no Santa Claus. And in this day and age there are no miracles—except those we work for ourselves. Our faiths are probably the most important element in our lives. There is something revealing about ourselves in where we place them. And once we do place them there is something revealing in how we maintain them. It merits the gift of something in ourselves. It is not an easy faith or a cheap faith. The idea is not only to have faith, but to KEEP faith.

City Council's "Huddle" Over Defunct Felines

How much does it cost to kill a cat? The question created some controversy in Sandwich, Ont., when the Essex County Humane society recently executed eight strays and presented a bill of $4 for the job to the town council.

The honorable aldermen drew pencils out of their pockets and reached for pads of paper. Heads were scratched and some really wonderful things were done with the multiplication tables with some equally wonderful results.

"It's easy," announced one city father. "Eight cats, $4; one cat, 50 cents."

"It isn't so," replied another. "One cat has nine lives. That makes the job worth only $.05555555 ad infinitum per life. And they only had to kill each cat once." He beamed at the impregnability of his argument.

"Well," said a third member of the council, "suppose some of these cats didn't have nine lives left. Suppose one of them had already died once, another twice, another three times—"

The rest of the council looked at him in disgust, put away their pencils and unanimously voted to pay the $4.

Comfort for Rangers

Forest rangers may lack certain comforts of less excitingly occupied employees, but they are certain to have plenty of coffee to drink. The forest service, packing rations kits for Uncle Sam's rangers throughout the West, has bought three carloads of coffee, or enough to make 2,500,000 cups of coffee at an average cost of one-half cent a cup in the coming year. Included in the rations kits also are candy, tinned bread, tea and canned meat and vegetables.

Stronger than He Was at Twenty

FIFTY-FIVE years old, and still going strong!

Do you want the secret of such vitality? It isn't what you eat, or any tonic you take. It's something anyone can do—something you can start today and see results in a week! All you do is give your vital organs the right stimulant.

A famous doctor discovered the way to stimulate a sluggish system to new energy. It brings fresh vigor to every organ. Being a physician's prescription, it's quite harmless. Tell your druggist you want a bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin. Get the benefit of its fresh laxative herbs, active senna, and that pure pepsin. Get that lazy liver to work, those stagnant bowels into action. Get rid of waste matter that is slow poison so long as it is permitted to remain in the system.

The new energy men and women feel before one bottle of Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin has been used up is proof of how much the system needs this help.

Get a bottle of this delicious syrup and let it end that constant worry about the condition of the bowels. Spare the children those bilious days that make them miserable. Save your household from the use of cathartics which lead to chronic constipation. And guard against auto-intoxication as you grow older.

Dr. Caldwell's syrup pepsin is such a well known preparation you can get it wherever drugs are sold and it isn't expensive.

December Took Record as Year's Longest Day

December 22 is, strange to say, the "longest" day of the year, and not the shortest, thus taking the record for length from June 21, the first day of summer. Here is the explanation of this apparently contradictory state of affairs, as given by Dr. C. C. Wylie, associate profession of astronomy at the University of Iowa:

"Because of the fact that we use mean time rather than apparent time, sun noon is later from day to day by thirty seconds near the date of the winter solstice. In mid-November, for those living near a standard meridian, sun noon occurs about sixteen minutes before 12:00, while in February it occurs about fourteen minutes after 12:00.

"When sun noon is falling later from day to day by a clock running on mean, or average, time the length of day defined as the interval from sun noon to sun noon is more than twenty-four hours. In this sense the longest day last year was December 22."

Last June 21, the first day of summer astronomers point out, was the longest day of the year in the number of hours of daylight, whereas December 22, when measured from noon to noon, had just 30 and two hundredths seconds more than 24 hours. A very close race but December 22 stretched ahead barely enough to win the title of "the year's longest day."

Latest News of the Work of the State Legislature Condensed for the Busy Reader

St. Paul—The federal government put repeal of the eighteenth amendment squarely before the states. The joint resolution of the U. S. senate and house proposing prohibition abandonment is in the hands of Gov. Olson. He placed it before the state legislature without comment. Thirty-six sates are required to repeal before it becomes a law. Senator Siegel, St. Paul, said he was in favor of proceeding similar to a manner in which presidential electors are named. Under his plan, delegates would be picked by both drys and wets from house legislative districts who would sit in the conventions, one which would be called for those opposed to repeal and another for those favoring it. The conventions, under his suggestion would then pick a slate of representatives, with their names to go on a ballot and be voted on by the people.

Although he said he would have voted against the proposed repeal of the eighteenth amendment, United States Senator Thomas D. Schall urged the state legislature to repeal the state dry act and adopt measures to control the sale of 3.05 per cent beer on his visit.

The state senate and house have passed the bill delaying from Feb. 28 to April 1 for time for paying personal property taxes this year. It was signed by the governor.

An 8 per cent gross earnings tax on the income of radio broadcasting stations would be imposed under a bill before the house. It is by Representatives Fay Cravens, Milaca, and Hjalmar Petersen, Askov.

A bill designed to divert shipment of hogs to the public markets from the small concentration centers in an effort to bring better prices to the farmers was before the senate committee on markets and marketing.

Carrying out its promise of economy in the state government, the senate finance committee proposed a slash of $1,400,000 in the cost of maintaining administrative offices of the state for the next two years.

The house of representatives, by a vote of 102 to 24, pushed through a committee bill for redistricting the state. The bill goes to the senate, which has under consideration a measure differing widely from the house bill.

The state livestock sanitary board is empowered to establish quarantine of domestic animals and poultry imported into the state if it finds it necessary in the interest of health, under a law signed by Governor Olson.

The house tax committee killed a proposal embodied in a bill by the Hennepin county delegation which would compel payment of sixty per cent of the taxes before property owners could institute court proceedings against an assessment.

The socalled open season which farmers would have on pheasants threatening their crops, proposed by Representative Otto Goetsch of Brownsdale, got nowhere with the house game and fish committee which returned the bill to its author.

The 1933 legislature must end its work on April 19, Henry W. Oehler, deputy attorney general ruled in answering a request from Representative Charles Munn, speaker of the house. The last day on which bills may be introduced is March 25 and April 18 is the last date upon which bills may be passed.

Though the house is operating at a cost $1,000 a week under that of the 1931 session, legislature time still is costing the state about $10 a minute, according to estimates. With only 101 regular employes, compared with an average of around 120 two years ago, the overhead has been sharply curtailed. At the present rate, he said, the cost is running at about $1,000 a week less than in 1931.

Senator Patrick Farnard of Hibbing is author of a bill to compel each insurance company doing business in the state, except farmers' mutual companies and those insuring against fire or hail, or real estate titles, to deposit $100,000 in securities for the protection of Minnesota policy holders. This, says the author, means that, in case a company goes insolvent or quits business, those who have paid premums will have protection.

Senator J. V. Weber of Slayton announced he will ask authority for a senate investigation to cover the troubles of the state conservation commission, which came to a head recently with the suspension of W. T. Cox as commissioner.

Gratitude to "the hands of Providence" is expressed by the state senate in a resolution adopted because of the escape from death by President-elect Franklin D. Roosevelt. Two democrats sponsored it. Gerald T. Mulin of Minneapolis and D. D. Murphy of Blue Earth.

Approved by A. L. Lindholm, chairman of the state parole board, a bill providing for a state probation system, to be administered by the parole board, was approved by the senate committee on crime prevention.

A bill pending, which would give justices of the peace jurisdiction to grant probation and stay sentences was indorsed at a meeting of the Association of Justices of the Peace. The measure has passed the house, and is before the senate. Under the present laws the justices cannot grant probation in deserving cases, nor can they stay sentences.

Business men from Duluth, St. Cloud, Rochester, Winona, Stillwater, Mankato, Red Wing, St. Paul and Minneapolis faced the house committee on taxes and tax laws in the house chamber and protested passage of a statutory income tax bill. The meeting was the result of a demand for a state wide public hearing on house file 367.

Determined opposition to two bills providing leniency for persons convicted of bank robbery, was voiced by Martin F. Ernst, president of the Minnesota Bankers' association. One bill, introduced by Representatives J. J. McDonough of St. Paul and R. J. Quinlivan of St. Cloud, would make persons convicted of bank robbery in which no shooting occurred eligible for parole after serving seven years of their sentence. The other would reduce the sentence for bank robberies in which no shooting occurred from life imprisonment to an indeterminate term of 10 to 50 years. This bill was recommended for passage by the house crime prevention committee, which also approved a bill to pay $3 a day to persons wrongfully imprisoned and later proved innocent of crime charged.

United States government officials moved into the state senate's inquiry of state highway contracts. The first phase of the federal investigation will include an examination of records concerning distribution of $12,000,000 of federal funds for state road building projects in the last two years.

The senate committee investigating the rural credit bureau will resume its work, with H. M. Feroe of Minneapolis, ousted recently as assistant attorney general assigned to the bureau, slated to testify. The committee has asked the attorney general for a ruling as to whether the credit bureau has not already exceeded the legal limitation of bonded debt. Senator R. N. Gardner, member of the committee, said he understood the bonded debt should not exceed the combined total of cash on hand available for loans, the amount of mortgages held by the bureau at book value, and the amount of real estate on hand as a result of mortgage foreclosure. M. A. Baker, accountant for the bureau, has testified the three items cited total $58,000,000, and the present bonded debt is $60,500,000.

Senator Henry G. Teigan of Minneapolis introduced a resolution which would direct the governor to designate the congressional district in which a vacancy occurs, in the event of death or disability of a congressman the next two years. He makes the proposal because the death of Congressman Godfrey G. Goodwin left some question as to what should be done in the event of vacancy. Nothing need be done in the Goodwin vacancy because his term is about to expire, but the nine who take their seats after March 4 were elected at large, and under the law the election to fill a vacancy would have to be statewide. Teigan's plan is to permit the governor to designate the district in which the vacancy might occur and have the election there.

What to do about $2,500,00 in state rural credit bonds, coming due this year and next, is engaging the legislature's attention. M. A. Baker, chief accountant for the department, was on the stand again at the investigation by a senate committee. He admitted the department has no funds in sight to pay the bonds and no authority to issue bonds to refund them.

Regret that a state as big and wealthy as Minnesota had to apply to the federal government for relief funds was expressed by Gov. Olson in a talk to club women in declaring the state cannot expect aid from the Reconstruction Finance corporation forever. He said he favored levying taxes to meet the need of poor people in the state. He urged passage of legislation to set up machinery to administer funds expected to be available from the R. F. C.

A concurrent resolution calling upon congress to urge all mortgage holders to be lenient in farm mortgage foreclosures was introduced in the house by Representative Elmer G. Holm, Dilworth. The measure also asks passage of the Shipstead bill, giving farmers a lower rate of interest. The farm situation now, the resolutions set forth, is a nationwide calamity.

Early action on a plan suggested by Gov. Olson to keep distressed farmers on their farms pending foreclosure negotiations was expected as the state senate judiciary committee reported favorably on a concurrent resolution proposed by Senator J. V. Weber, Slayton.

The house has passed and has sent to the senate Representative Charles Munn's bill permitting a referendum vote on a $500,000 bond issue to establish a Hennepin county market in Minneapolis. The house vote was 95 to 0.

Health in Teen Age

By AMELIA H. GRANT, M. A., R. N., Director, Bureau of Nursing, New York City Department of Health.

"SWEETS TO THE SWEET" NOT SO SWEET

Every girl who values her health and her appearance will not eat too much candy. If you will consider for a moment that many of the pimply conditions of the skin are due to an excess of sugar in the diet, you will cut down on your consumption of confections.

Let me warn you that over-indulgence in sugars and other sweets is one of the chief causes of obesity, often the forerunner of diabetes. If every girl in her teens will bear in mind that diabetes is almost as prevalent as tuberculosis, and that the disease is on the increase, she will have additional reason for following this advice.

Candies and other confections used in moderation are healthful, provided they are not eaten between meals. A dish of ice cream for dessert, or during the evening, is excellent, but sweetened drinks and the munching of confections between meals are not conducive either to good health or to good complexion. If you are thirsty between meals, drink a glass of cold milk. This is the most refreshing of foods, and it is good for you.

Marriage Days Matter of Individual Choice

Every mother's daughter entertains hopes of being led to the altar some day by a young beau garcon. And most girls have their preference for certain days on which to be married, no matter how many times they venture on the sea of matrimony. Statisticians are now using this preference for marriage days as an argument for reform of the calendar. They claim the present irregular calendar makes it difficult to collect statistics of marriages—due to the fact that people have their own pet days of the week for that great event.

But whether you decide to get married on Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, or Saturday—most people do it on Saturday now because they can only afford a week-end honeymoon—don't worry about the statisticians. They will have to record the event as a matter of duty anyway.

Dr. E. Lyman Cornell of Northwestern university advocates letting the girl pick the husband, not the man pick the wife, because, he says, "as a rule a girl will pick well."—Pathfinder Magazine.

THEY HAVE FOUND A 3-MINUTE WAY TO RELIEVE SORE THROAT

All Pain And Soreness Eased In Few Minutes This Simple Way

GARGLE Thoroughly—Throw Your Head Way Back, Allowing a Little to Trickle Down Your Throat.

Proves Only Medicine Helps A Sore Throat

Modern medical science now throws an entirely new light on sore throat. A way that eases the pain, rawness and irritation in as little as two or three minutes.

Results are among the most extraordinary in medical science. On doctors' advice, millions are following this way . . . discarding old-time "washes" and "antiseptics." For it has been found that only medicine can help a sore throat.

Simple To Do. All you do is crush and dissolve three BAYER Aspirin Tablets in half a glass of water. Gargle with it twice—as pictured above. If you have any indication of a cold—before gargling take 2 Bayer Aspirin Tablets with a full glass of water. This is to combat any signs of cold that have gone into your system. Keep on taking if cold has a "hold." For Genuine Bayer Aspirin will not harm you. Your doctor will tell you, it does not depress the heart. Get a box of 12 or a bottle of 24 or 100 at any drug store.

Reduces Infection, Eases Pain Instantly. Gargling with Bayer Aspirin will do three things: Relieve soreness at once. Allay inflammation. AND—reduce infection; which is the important thing in fighting a sore throat.

It requires medicine—like BAYER ASPIRIN—to do these things! That is why throat specialists throughout America are prescribing this BAYER gargle in place of old-time ways. Results are quick and amazing.

Be careful, however, that you get real BAYER Aspirin Tablets for this purpose. For they dissolve completely enough to gargle without leaving irritating particles. Watch this when you buy.

A $1 Dinner for 4

WE'RE talking, now, about four average people — the average American family of two adults and two children. Men like meats. Women like salads. Children should have potatoes and one other vegetable.

Well, here's a model menu providing foods to please this average American family—at a price that pleases the average pocketbook.

Louisiana Pot Roast 47¢
Boiled Potatoes 4¢
Buttered Cabbage 8¢
Bread and Butter 8¢
Apricot and Cream Cheese Salad 25¢
Coffee with Cream 25¢

Louisiana Pot Roast: Stick six cloves into one and one-fourth pounds of chunk rump roast and sear thoroughly on all sides in a deep heavy kettle or pot using a little fat or drippings. Add one small sliced onion, one-half green pepper, shredded, and cook for a moment. Then add the contents of one 10½-ounce can of tomatoes and water enough to almost half cover the meat. Add salt and pepper to taste, and bring to boiling. Cover and simmer gently until tender. Remove the meat, and thicken the liquid in a pan with a little flour smoothed with water. Pour over the meat and serve.

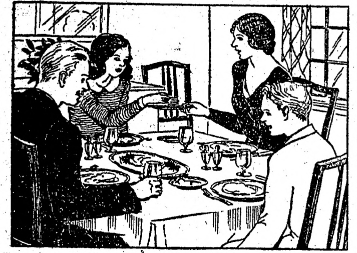
A $1 Dinner for 4



YOU are cordially invited to be present at this dinner to be served in your own home any evening at six o'clock at a cost of only one dollar.

MENU
Sauteed Salmon Slices with Creamed Peas 28¢
Sweet Mixed Pickles 5¢
Buttered Asparagus 25¢
Orange and Banana Salad 15¢
Bread and Butter 8¢
Caramel Nut Pudding 16¢
Demi-tasse 3¢

Sautéed Salmon Slices with Creamed Peas: Add one-half teaspoon salt to one and one-half cups of boiling water; add one-half cup cornmeal, and cook until thick. Add one-half the contents of a tall can of salmon, salt, and pepper to taste and a few drops of lemon juice. Pack into a greased loaf pan and let chill. Cut in slices, dip in fine crumbs and sauté in fat until a nice brown. Make a white sauce of two tablespoons butter, two tablespoons flour and one and one-half cups diluted evaporated milk. Season to taste with salt, and add the contents of one 8-ounce can of peas. Serve over salmon.

Caramel Nut Pudding: Scald one-half of a one-pound can of evaporated milk with one-half cup of water. Melt six tablespoons of brown sugar to a syrup, add to the milk, and stir until dissolved. Smooth together three and one-half tablespoons of cornstarch, a few grains of salt and four tablespoons of water. Add to the caramel and milk, in a double boiler, and stir until thick. Then let cook for fifteen minutes. Cool, add a few drops of vanilla and four tablespoons chopped nuts, and chill. Serve with one-third cup of cream which has been whipped.*

HIGH SCHOOL

We are now taking our six weeks exams and are therefore too serious for any jokes this time.

Grades I and II

The following children had 100 in Spelling last Friday.

Wayne, Elaine, Irene, Lillian, Rueben, Roy, Harriet, Ruby, and Marian.

We are proud of the calendar Donald has drawn for our room for the month of March.

The first grade are taking a trip to Holland in their language periods this week. They are also making a border of windmills, geese, tulips, and Dutch girls.

The Second graders are studying manuscript form. We are copying stories and also are working on original stories this week. We are trying hard to remember to place every capital letter, period and question mark in its correct place.

In Art class we have been working on Jumping Jacks.

Grades III, IV and V

Grade 4—Lorene Fluke, Lillian Gilbertson.

Grade 5—Lyla Kolden, Vernice Tollefsrud, Myrtle Ness.

The third grade have started the study of Holland.

Myrtle Ness and Vernice Tollefsrud had the most 100's in 5th grade Arithmetic the past six weeks. They were a tie.

Russell Sanoden, Lois Hanson, and Romal Burtness had the most 100's in third grade Arithmetic the past six weeks. They were a tie.

Palma Johnson had the most 100's in fourth grade Arithmetic the past six weeks.

Grades VI, VII and VIII

In the 7th grade Geography six weeks test Arnold, Lowell, Lorraine and Clarin got the highest scores.

Mrs. R. Werner and Mrs. J. G. Nelson were visitors in our room on Monday afternoon.

The children in the Fifth grade studied pictures in their Language class last week. The following poems were made:

GEORGE WASHINGTON

George Washington was brave and true,
He always wanted you to be, too.
He could never tell a lie,
No matter how hard he would try.
For once when he cut down the cherry tree,
His father said, "Tell the truth to me."
George said, "It was I,"
And did not tell a lie.
—Vernice Tollefsrud

GEORGE WASHINGTON

Washington, Washington,
My but you're great.
You're father of our country
And the father of our state.
I would like to be like Washington, too,
And then I could be brave and true. —Lyla Kolden

THE MINUTE MAN

This is called, 'The Minute Man,'
He always wanted to fight for his land;
But when the British came to fight,
He always wanted to fight with all his might. —Lyla Kolden

These poem was made in Fifth grade History class:

SUSAN B. ANTHONY

I wish I could be her,
Be an American reformer.
A great leader was she,
The women she tried to free.
She was born in an eastern state.
Her work here was very great.
A teacher was she,
The women she did free.

The Flavor of Butter

Butter has a flavor all its own—smooth, delicate, meltingly delicious.

One of the surest ways of making foods savory and palatable, is to use plenty of butter in their preparation.

Use butter, on the table,
In cooking, frying, and roasting,
In seasoning meats, fish and vegetables,
In making pies and all kinds of cakes,
In desserts, puddings and sauces,
In candy, sweets, and delicacies.

Mortgage Foreclosure Sales Halted Until May 1 in Minn.

Halting of mortgage foreclosure proceedings in Minnesota until May 1 or "further notice" was ordered recently by Governor Floyd B. Olson in an executive proclamation.

The order was addressed to sheriffs and peace officers. It is made on the ground that the public peace is endangered by the present situation. The order was not issued before, the governor said, because the acute situation had not developed.

With the order, the governor also sent a special message to the legislature, urging action to relieve the situation. He proposed a debt commission, to work through county bodies in the adjustment of foreclosue matters. This is similar to a plan offered previously by Sen. J. V. Weber of Slayton.

This order is not a moratorium, the governor insisted, but an emergency move to prevent trouble until relief measures can be put into effect. It would be "unwise and unjust," he said, to use armed forces to carry thru foreclosure proceedings under present conditions.

Governor Olson ordered that every sheriff, constable or other police of the state "refrain and desist" until May I or "or until further order" from foreclosing or attempting to foreclose any any mortgage upon any of the following properties in the state:

Real estate upon which the mortgagor has his residence.

Farm machinery and livestock in use and possessed by a mortgagor actively engaged in farming.

Agriculture produce in the hands of the producer.

The debt commissions proposed would provide in each county one representative of debtors, one of creditors, and a third member to be selected by the other two. They would pass on the "reasonableness and justice" of any contemplated foreclosure.

What will an automobile do that is traveling sixty miles an hour? What is the driving force? An automobile traveling at sixty miles an hour has the same capacity af doing damage that the same automobile would have if it were dropped off a ten story building. That is the answer to these questions. Think of the terrific impact when that car strikes another car or a person!

Because of the distances required to stop a car driven at certain speeds, it becomes extremely dangerous to drive at an unreasonable speed under abnormal traffic conditions or bad weather.

Again I must come to the old conclusion that judgment, common sense, and courtesy must be practiced.

The safest way to drive is to take into consideration all conditions under which you are driving and apply to those conditions a few ounces of horse-sense.

Grandma Sor of Rosewood Dies at Age of 98 Years

Grandma Sor, one of the oldest residents of Marshall county and for almost 50 years a resident of Rosewood, passed away at her home last Friday evening at the age of 98 and a half years. She was the first Swedish woman to homestead directly at Rosewood, and has since June 1883 been making her home on the farm which was then chartered from the government.

Mrs. Johanna Sor was born near Orebo, Sweden on Oct. 23, 1834. In 1864 she was married to John Sor who died in 1921. In 1881 they immigrated to America, coming to Ishpeming, Michigan where Sor became a mining blacksmith, and Mrs. Sor together with two daughters conducted a room and boarding house until 1883, when they came to Marshall county to secure a homestead. Upon arriving they came on one of the first trains from Crookston to St. Hilaire, which then was the terminal point of the Great Northern railway. From St. Hilaire they came by ox team to their homestead 15 miles further north.

To the union was born two daughters, Hannah who died in 1894, and Mary who survives. One grandson, Joel E. Shoberg also survives. Mrs. Sor was much interested in church work, and was a true Christian from youth. In early pioneer days she established a Sunday school at her home, and numerous Mission meetings were conducted by traveling speakers and later by called pastors before any church was built.

The funeral was conducted on Wednesday afternoon from the Mission church in Rosewood with Rev. C. E. Anderson of Viking officiating. Interment was made in the Wildwood Cemetery located on the farm of the deceased. All arrangements were in charge of Arvid Carlson, a personal friend of Mrs. Sor, who conducts a funeral parlor up at Middle River.

"Doc" Swan Pulls Out

"Doc" Swan pulled out on high yesterday with his remodeled Mayflower. He had on a very high tension push-em-ahead device on the rear for steep hill climbing and screen grid radiator and coast-if-you-can with a full choke attachment on the carburetor for taking the fast turns, pass jack rabbits and other small matters of business that may come before the bus before it takes off for Washington for a conference with a fleet of pensioned off war ships where "Doc" has an idea he will be given a berth for it where the world's most famous relics are stored in cold running water in a ten cent museum.

WHAT PUZZLED HER

A young wife, wishing to announce the birth of her first child to a friend in a distant city, telegraphed: "Isaiah 9:6." Which passage begins, "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given." Her friend, not familiar with the Scriptures, said to her husband: "Margaret evidently has a boy who weighs nine pound and six ounces, but why on earth did they name him Isaiah?"—The Congregationalist.

LADY BLANCHE FARM

A Romance of the Commonplace

By FRANCES PARKINSON KEYES

Copyright by Frances Parkinson Keyes

SYNOPSIS

Motoring through Vermont, Philip Starr, young Boston architect, meets Blanche Manning, seventeen, with whom he is immediately enamored. It being a long distance to Burlington, Starr's destination, Blanche suggests, the village of Hamstead not boasting a hotel, that he become, for the night, a guest of her cousin, Mary Manning. Mary receives Philip with true Vermont hospitality, and he makes the acquaintance of her cousin Paul, recognized as her fiance. Starr finds Mary is acquainted with Gale Hamlin, noted Boston architect, in whose office Philip is employed. He informs her of his desire to win Blanche for his wife. She tells him of an old family superstition concerning the "Blanches" of the Manning family. Paul Manning is inclined to be dissipated, not realizing Mary's true worth. Mary's reproaches for his undue "conviviality" are badly received by Paul, and the girl begins to have misgivings as to the wisdom of the alliance. Gale Hamlin, long a suitor for Mary's hand, visits Hamstead but makes no progress in his lovemaking.

"For Heaven's sake, Philip! Don't you realize that I want to get away from Hamstead and stay away? If we fixed up this place, and put all that money into it, we'd have to keep coming back to it! That's the last thing on earth I want to do! I don't want an old-fashioned house, full of old-fashioned furniture, in an old-fashioned village! I want to live in a big city. I don't want a quiet existence; I want to give parties all the time—except when I am going out to them—little afternoon bridge parties and little evening theater parties—and heaps of dancing. And I simply adore going to the movies and shopping around for lacy nightgowns and getting an ice cream soda in the middle of the morning, and having lunch at a tearoom. That's what I've done the few times I've been to town to visit. Why Philip, I thought you were going to help me to escape from Lady Blanche farm! I thought you wanted me to have a good time and pretty clothes, and heaps of new friends. . . ."

There was something almost grotesque about her, in spite of her loveliness, as she stood before him in her silvery brocade, clamoring for tawdry possessions and trifling pastimes. The sudden dread lest the delicate fabric of his romance might be rent before his eyes, filled Philip with fear. But this fear was engulfed in the terrorized premonition which his research had aroused.

Somehow he steadied himself and managed to speak lightly. "I do want you to have a good time and party clothes and pleasant friends, darling," he said. "And you shall. We won't say anything more about this scheme of mine, since it doesn't appeal to you. It was only a fancy, anyway."

He drew her close to him, drugging himself, for the moment, with the delight of feeling her in his arms. But afterwards he sought out Mary.

Everyone always took stories of trouble to Mary, sure of help and understanding and comfort. The fact that it was ironing day, and that he found her, in the middle of a sultry afternoon, toiling away in a hot kitchen, and not sitting with folded hands in some secluded and restful spot, as comforters are traditionally supposed to be found, made no difference. He could not bring himself to speak of Blanche's outburst, but he did speak of the ominous sense of foreboding which had been awakened by his perusal of Hastings' history and which had persisted ever since. Mary listened to his recital in silence, and without stopping her work. And when Philip had finished, she went to the stove for a hot iron, tested it with her hand, and began to press out Seth's overalls before she answered.

"You don't think we've kept this from you wilfully, do you?" she said, at length. "You know I asked you, right off, if there were anything that would make you want Blanche less, and you said no. And I'm sure that the reason she didn't tell you the whole story, that day by the brook, was simply because, as she said, you would think she was 'awfully conceited and fresh' if she inferred that she thought she was beautiful and likely to be loved at first sight by a handsome stranger. She doesn't read much, and she's probably forgotten part of the legend, anyway, even if she ever read it. You—you wouldn't be so cruel as to spoil her lovely happiness by telling her about it now, would you?"

"Good Lord, Mary, you don't think I want to, do you? It would just about kill me to give her up."

"Then what do you mean?"

"I thought you might think—I think myself perhaps I ought to—on her account, you know."

"On her account?" said Mary, stupidly.

"If there is any truth in a thing like that, isn't it my duty to?"

"Why?"

"So—she could do something safer, of course."

Mary folded the overalls carefully. "There isn't anything safer for a girl to do," she said in a low voice, "than to marry the man she loves. If—if he loves her. And if her life is the one that's short, what does that matter, if it's full and perfect, and—complete?"

"I guess you're right," said Philip huskily. Then, still hesitating—"You don't suppose I think you're right just because I want to, do you?"

"Did you ever think anything was right just for that reason?"

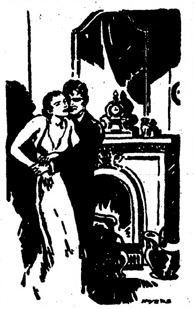
Philip searched his conscience.

"I don't believe so," he said at last, smiling at her.

Mary smiled back; and looking at her, but thinking of Blanche, Philip felt that this episode was closed.

The second episode had nothing whatever to do with the past, but a good deal to do with the present. Try as he might—and he certainly did try—Philip could not succeed in liking Paul. What was worse, the more he saw of him, the less he liked him. The dislike, noticed, but carefully hushed up by Violet, seemed to be entirely mutual. And Paul was spending so much of his time, especially since the arrival of the new motor, in the society of Miss Rosalie King, a summer visitor, a worker in a New York department store, that his family was favored less and less by his presence. Philip, who had marveled at the way Mary bore Paul's shortcomings, and not only bore, but forgave them from the beginning, marveled still more at the apparent indifference with which she bore his frank neglect.

But Mary was, as he was eventually to discover, far less indifferent than he had supposed, and knowing a little of the capacity for suffering that many silent and self-contained persons possess, the discovery disturbed him not a little. Next to Blanche, there was no one in the world for whom he cared as much as he already did for Mary, and they were naturally thrown a great deal together. Going into Seth Manning's house one day on an errand, he first encountered Moses.



Mary Tried to Struggle Away From Him, Hot With Fury, Sick With Shame and Disgust.

"Where's Mary?" inquired Philip.

"In her room," said Moses.

"In her room!" Philip echoed. It was so unusual for Mary to be "off duty" even for a few minutes, that the fact was alarming.

"Yes. Lyin' on the bed."

"Is she sick?"

"No. Cryin'. Hard," added Moses with emphasis.

"Do you know why?" pursued Philip.

"Paul," said Moses laconically.

Philip turned thoughtfully away. He was sleeping in the room adjoining Paul's on his brief visits at Lady Blanche farm, and he had some idea of the hours his future brother-in-law was keeping. After vacillating for a short time between his reluctance to meddle in other people's affairs and his distress at the thought of Mary's unhappiness, he waited up for Paul that night, and endeavored to have a talk with him.

The attempt was far from successful. Philip tried to put the question fairly and kindly. But Paul was enraged.

"You had better mind your own business," he shouted, so loudly that Philip feared Violet and Blanche might both be aroused. "I don't tell you how to manage things with my sister, do I? You've done just as you d—d pleased about the whole affair, since the day you first struck the farm. And I'll thank you to let mine alone, too. I guess I know what I'm about!"

"I'm afraid you don't. That's just it," said Philip. "And I'm older than you, and have been about a bit more, and—"

"Oh, you're afraid I don't, are you? Well, I should worry," jeered Paul, who was picking up more or less New York slang. "We're a good little boy, aren't we? Never hit it up in all our lives! Well, run along to bed, that's the best place for one of your advanced years and experience—you must look out not to keep too late hours, or get your feet wet, or something like that—might be fatal!" Then as Philip hesitated, Paul burst into oaths before which Philip, hitherto unacquainted with certain phrases of rural vocabulary, stood electrified for a moment, and then walked into his own room and closed the door.

And so the second episode, also, came to an abrupt end, and he strove to dismiss both from his mind.

The wedding day, which seemed to the impatient bridegroom so interminably slow in arriving, came at last—warm, clear and cloudless. The little white Congregational church, where all the Mannings had always worshiped, and where the marriage ceremony was performed, was decorated as it never had been before in the hundred and fifty years of its existence. The Wallacetown "orchestra" played at the farm. A wedding supper, more sumptuous than any of which Hamstead had ever partaken, was spread on tables under huge awnings extending over the lawns, and two rooms were filled with presents which any bride might well have been proud to display and possess. Blanche, wearing the countess' pearls, enveloped in a mist of white tulle and soft lace, looked more exquisite and fairy-like than ever. Philip's friends—and they seemed to be legion—were there in full force, nor had Hamstead realized before how many Boston friends Mary had, too. Gale Hamlin was there, with his sister and niece. Mr. Davis, the senior partner of the firm, had come, too, with his wife and sons; and many others. All Hamstead was there, of course, and most of White Water and some of Wallacetown; and all Hamstead included, that summer, pretty, painted Rosalie King, with her cousins, the Westons. . . .

Finally, Blanche and Philip drove off in their own motor, showered with rice and confetti, cheering and waving from their ribbon-bedecked car as they went. The guests remained a little longer to laugh and cry, and "talk it over." Then gradually they went home, motor-horns tooting, aged carryalls creaking, boys and girls singing as they walked arm in arm up the dusty road to the village. Jane crossed the lawn to her own house and sat looking at her ribbon-tied candy box for some minutes before she went to bed. Violet collapsed, in an orgy of satisfaction and tears, and Mary undressed her and made her a hot drink with a bromide tablet melted in it. And finally, coming out of her cousin's room at two o'clock in the morning, after having made her "as comfortable as could be expected"—to quote Violet's own feeble whisper—she met Paul face to face in the hall.

He lurched towards her unsteadily. There had been champagne, and a strong punch served at the wedding, for Violet had had some fear that Philip's Boston friends might think her "countrified." And all the evening, Paul had been alternately consuming first punch and then champagne and then punch again. The results of his over-indulgence were all too obvious in both his appearance and his manner. Mary looked at him and her very soul revolted.

"How dare you!" she cried, "disgrace your sister's wedding day like this!"

Paul seemed hardly to hear her. But there was no doubt that he saw her and that he found her very good to look at. Philip had once said that Mary was lovely always, but that if she ever got angry, she would be magnificent. Mary was very angry now, so angry that she hardly knew that she was wounded to the heart as well. She was, indeed, magnificent, beautiful as Paul had never seen her, had never known she could be. He threw his arms around her, and began to kiss her violently on her neck, her cheeks, her lips. Mary tried to struggle away from him, hot with fury, sick with shame and disgust. He only held her closer. At last she succeeded in freeing one arm, and with all her might, struck him across the mouth. Instead of sobering Paul, it stimulated his raging senses to the point of frenzy. He confronted Mary with unleashed fury.

"You canting hypocrite!" he shouted, furiously, "moping around all summer, acting as if you were crazy to have me make love to you! And now going for me like a wildcat when I try it! I guess I knew what I was doing when I let you alone! I guess I can get all the kisses I want without paying for them by being hit in the face! From now on, you can mope forever for all I care—but you won't have a chance to hit me again! I never asked you to marry me, anyhow—you've only pretended I did! I never wanted you at all! Why should I want a prude—or a shrew—or a jailor—for a wife? You wanted me—though you've tried to act so high and holy about it! And d—n it, you almost got me! But I'm through with you now—through—do you hear? I'm free! And you'll never get me again after this!"

Primitive Man's First Idea of Architecture

Historians of architecture tell us that man's first building efforts were for the purpose of protecting himself from the weather. He required shelter from the angry elements, and hence "the inclemency of the seasons was the mother of architecture." In his primitiveness he took the nests of birds and the lairs of beasts as his model, and the earliest hut was probably a mere arbor of twigs, afterwards covered with mud. Then huts were built of branches of trees and covered with turf. And there is every reason to suppose that the men who built shelters of this kind were agriculturists by occupation. The hunter, on the other hand, preferred a cave-dwelling, which protected him better from the attacks of his fellows or wild animals, while the shepherds who led a nomadic or wandering life, as some of them do today in Central Asia, naturally devised tents.

Makes Point Against One Evolution Theory

The fact that both human beings and the great apes of 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 years ago belonged to the giant class of creatures, says Gerrit S. Miller, noted mammalogist, practically invalidates any presumption that one is derived from the other. Such a derivation was the original Darwinian thesis which still is maintained by many anthropologists.

No case is known, Miller declares in the journal of the American Society of Mammalogists, in which a race of "giants" has given rise to a new line of development equivalent to the development of man from the great apes. If this actually happened, he says, it was in violation of apparently well-established evolutionary trends. However, he does not deny the descent of man from simian ancestors, which is well demonstrated by other lines of evidence.—Pathfinder Magazine.

HOW TO STOP A COLD QUICK AS YOU CAUGHT IT
A New Method Doctors Everywhere Are Advising
1 Take Bayer Aspirin according to directions in package.
2 Drink Full Glass of Water.
3 If throat is sore, crush and dissolve 3 Bayer Aspirin Tablets in a half glass of warm water and gargle according to directions.

Almost Instant Relief In This Way

If you have a cold—don't take chances with "cold killers" and nostrums. A cold is too dangerous to take chances on.

The simple method pictured above is the way doctors throughout the world now treat colds.

It is recognized as the QUICKEST, safest, surest way. For it will check an ordinary cold almost as fast as you caught it.

That is because the real BAYER Aspirin embodies certain medical qualities that strike at the base of a cold almost INSTANTLY.

You can combat nearly any cold you get simply by taking BAYER Aspirin and drinking plenty of water every 2 to 4 hours the first day and 3 or 4 times daily thereafter. If throat is sore, gargle with 3 BAYER Aspirin Tablets crushed and dissolved in a half glass of warm water, repeating every 2 or 3 hours as necessary. Sore throat eases this way in a few minutes, incredible as this may seem.

Ask your doctor about this. And when you buy, see that you get the real BAYER Aspirin Tablets. They dissolve almost instantly. And thus work almost instantly when you take them. And for a gargle, Genuine Bayer Aspirin Tablets dissolve with speed and completeness, leaving no irritating particles or grittiness. Get a box of 12 or bottle of 24 or 100 at any drug store.

EVENTS OF THE WEEK THROUGHOUT THE STATE TOLD IN BRIEF FORM

Fargo.—Fifty to six men are being employed in the constructing of the new city dam south of Fargo.

Valley City.—The Barnes County Labor club at a recent meeting elected S. V. Anderson as their president.

Hazen.—Hazen high school is the winner of the Mercer county basketball championship for this season.

Egeland.—Over forty men and boys of this community took part in three rabbit drives held in the vicinity. They bagged 127 rabbits.

Ellendale.—The Ellendale firemen will hold their annual dance, which will be in the carnival style, this year on St. Patrick's day.

Sharon.—More than 500 persons attended the ludefisk dinner served farmers and townspeople of the community by the Sharon Boosters club.

Washburn. — Gordon Fahlgren, Washburn school boy who broke his neck the early part of the winter, will be out of his cast in six weeks.

Zap.—One hundred dollars in silver was the amount of the loot taken when the First State bank of Zap was the target of robbers.

Kulm.—The Kulm high school won the district tournament by defeating their three opposing teams in basketball on the LaMoure floor.

Finley.—Steele county received $27,569.90 from the Great Northern railway for taxes during 1932. Of this amount Finley received $3,096.52.

Aneta.—Wesley Haraldson, student at the Jamestown college, won the Old Line oratorical contest and also won third place in the Peace Oratorical contest held at Jamestown.

Cando. — Five hundred and forty-four rabbits were shot in two drives held in the vicinity of Cando. One drive netted 258 jacks and the other 286.

Ellendale.—The 150,000 egg capacity plant of Meyer's Hatcheries has swung into action for the 1933 baby chick season. Meyer's Hatcheries also have plants at Ashley, Edgeley, and Valley City.

Grand Forks.—July 24 and 25, are the dates set for the annual convention to be held at Grand Forks of several organizations of postal employees. It is expected that more than 800 delegates will attend.

Willow City.—Guy T. Bohan, for more than twenty years a grain buyer at Deering, has accepted the management of the Farmers Elevator at Willow City. He succeeds L. F. Brady, who died recently.

Carrington.—A business meeting of Lutheran families was held in the court houes at Carrington in which they made plans to erect a new church building at Carrington this spring. Plans were made to construct a $5,000 church of which a name will be chosen later.

Bismarck.—In spite of her age of 81 years, Mrs. J. E. Perry, has knitted 21 pairs of mittens for poor children during the winter months. Mrs. Perry makes the mittens from yarn salvaged from old sweaters, scarfs, tec.

Noonan.—R. A. Moger, oiler on a large stripping shovel in the mines of the Baukol Noonan Lignite, Inc., was crushed to death when he stepped out of the shovel house and was caught between it and a stationary platform.

Carson.—Bertha Huber, 12-year-old Carson girl, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Huber of Carson, suffered a fractured jaw, broken collarbone, and head injuries, when she was accidentally struck by a motorist on a Bismarck street.

Washburn.—Farmers in the vicinity of Washburn are moving all their hay that was stacked in the lowlands to higher levels. Thick ice and heavy snows are expected to cause an old-fashioned ice jam and flood of the Missouri river.

Petersburg.—A. I. Cole, 55, barber at Petersburg, was fatally injured by a car which he cranked while in gear. He received a crushed chest and broken hip in the accident. Cole died en route to the hospital at Grand Forks.

Grafton.—Three Grafton youths who have given the police considerable trouble during the past two years, are now in jail facing a third degree burglary charge after being caught entering the Grafton Bakery.

Devils Lake.—James Fahl, son of Rev. B. A. Fahl of this city, has won a two-year scholarship at the Presbyterian Theological seminary in Chicago. This is James Fahl's third year at the school and will graduate in June.

Grand Forks.—Margaret Thompson, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. Thompson of Cando, and Bruce Severson, Grand Forks, were chosen to take the leading roles in the annual presentation of the Flickertail Follies, campus vaudeville show at the university.

Northwood.—Oluf Otlie, 69, for the past thirty years police chief of Northwood, was taken by death. He came to Northwood when he was 15 years old.

Enderlin. — Monoxide gas nearly caused the dath of Fred Underwood and Ole Assleson, of Enderlin, while motoring home from Anselm. It is thought that traveling with the wind the gas was forced up through the foot boards and all the windows in the car being closed the poisonous gas had no way to escape. After reaching Enderlin they both collapsed.

NEW RECIPES FOR THE WINTER MENU

Escalloped Dishes in Wide Variety That Will Be Found to Be Both Appetizing and Nutritious.

Escalloped vegetables make good luncheon or supper dishes substantial enough for the main part of the meal. In cold weather some hot food is desirable for each menu of a day and these escalloped dishes are hearty, tasty, and hot. There is wide variety in them. Pieces of bread or crumbs which are not fresh are usual ingredients, making the cost small in proportion to the amount. If rice, macaroni, etc., are used these are inexpensive also. What is needed is enough of the vegetable to permeate the bread to supply a rich flavor to the whole. The more pronounced the flavor of the vegetable the less of it will be needed, while with a delicate flavored vegetable more will be needed.

Escalloped Cauliflower With Cheese.

Freshly boiled cauliflower or leftovers can be used. If the latter is not sufficient it can be increased by the addition of cabbage chopped, but not too fine. Put a layer of finely broken pieces of bread in the bottom of a buttered baking dish. Dot with butter and sprinkle with salt, pepper, and celery salt. Dot with small bits of ordinary cheese. On this put a layer of cauliflower. Continue with layers of seasoned bread crumbs and cheese alternating with cauliflower, cauliflower and cabbage, or just cabbage. Moisten well with rich milk. The top layer, of fine bread crumbs, should have extra bits of butter on it and no cheese. Bake for 20 minutes or until the top is a delicate brown. Serve hot.

Escalloped Italian Onions.

Line the bottom of a buttered baking dish with bread crumbs seasoned with salt and pepper, and dotted with butter. Over this put a layer of boiled Italian onions cut into small pieces. If the onions are cut before boiling they will take less time to get done. Dot the onion layer lightly with minced celery and slivers of sweet pepper. Fill the dish with these alternate layers, having the last one fine bread crumbs well seasoned and dotted with butter. Moisten with soup stock or milk. Bake 20 minutes or until a light brown. Serve hot. Fresh baked corn bread and peas make a good combination to go with these escalloped Italian onions. If these are not obtainable any other onions can be used.

Tomatoes and Corn With Spaghetti.

Break spaghetti into small pieces. Boil in salted water until tender. Drain. Put a layer of this spaghetti into a buttered baking dish. Season with salt, pepper, celery salt and finely minced parsley. Cover with slices of ripe tomato or with solid pieces of stewed or canned tomato. Sprinkle very lightly with fine bread crumbs. Cover them with canned corn highly seasoned with salt, pepper and dot with butter. Fill the dish with layers of spaghetti, tomatoes, and corn as given, having bread crumbs on top. Moisten with a thin white sauce. Dot top with butter. Brown in oven. Just before serving sprinkle finely minced fresh parsley sprigs over the top and put one large slice of ripe tomato in center of top.

Declares That Daily Bath May Be Harmful

The daily bath has no special effect upon the health. Quite the contrary. Even for the sake of cleanliness it need not be taken daily. There is a further liability to weakness which will work out in the end to a tendency to catch cold.

Nervous persons and convalescents might conceivably benefit from a daily bath if it were not maintained as a habit longer than a few weeks.

How about the Japanese with their daily baths? That is another sort of bath, and lasts for the most part barely two minutes.

How about cold baths? These should really be swims, and even as regards these there are reservations to be made.

These considerations are urged against the daily bath, not against baths in the warm weather, and as far as possible in the open air. Only robust bathing fanatics would want to take their "swim" all the year through, every day.—Professor Strassburger, in Zeitschrift fur Aztliche Fortbildung, Berlin.

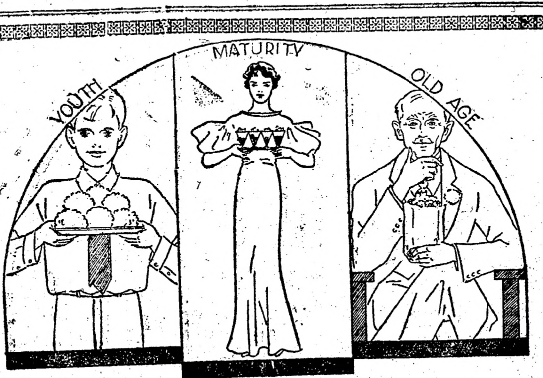
Whe-- provides an infinite variety of tempting, delicious baked foods which add health and joy to every meal.



POPULAR POPCORN

HOW do you prefer your popcorn—in a sack, along with a glass of erstwhile "pink lemonade," or in stuffing for all sorts of fudges, nougats and sweets, or merrily floating on the surface of creamy soups, or in cheese balls with fruit salads, or in custards and puddings?

They're all good ways, and your preference will merely indicate to which generation you belong. Let's see. Back in the days when the circus-in-town was the big event of the year, there was only one way to see the show right—even if you had to water the elephants to do it. And that was with a sack of peanuts in your pocket, a sack of popcorn in your hand, and a glass of pink lemonade to come when you got too thirsty. That was popcorn indeed—popped while you wait, with a generous pour of melted butter and a big shake of salt—all for a nickel.

Todays It's Even Better

In these days when the younger generation get together for fudge parties off-at-school, or Friday nights in the kitchen at home—popcorn is something else again. Its jolly white kernels go into fudge to make it twice as much, and twice as good; into nougats to make them fat and funny-shaped, but heavenly to eat; or into brittle candies rolled out with chopped popcorn—so crisp that they crackle.

The modern hostess of this generation has devised still other uses for this delicious and healthful food. Adventurous departures, you'll say, until you taste them. Then you'll agree that they are bully ideas. For why shouldn't crisp, buttered kernels of popcorn serve instead of croutons to float over the surface of such soups as cream of corn, puree of tomato, asparagus bouillon and many others?

Try This Way

And why, when salad rolls and crackers have become tiresome to serve with salads, shouldn't we conjure up golden cheese popcorn balls that somehow go better than anything imaginable with pear salad, say? Even with apple pie, you'll find these balls an interesting and delicious variation from the usual cubes of cheese.

For puddings—especially if there are youngsters to whom custard, tapioca and junket, disguise them as you may, are just custard, tapioca and junket—popcorn is a jolly idea which makes them altogether eligible.

Yes, we are coming to the recipes. But just a word, first. Since these dishes are all dependent on popcorn being perfect, be sure you use canned popcorn which is responsible for this new interest in an old favorite, because it all pops, it is full-grained, delicious, and there is no gamble on good grains.

Popcorn Custard: Beat two eggs, add one-half cupful sugar and one-eighth teaspoon salt; pour in two cupfuls hot milk slowly, stirring until the sugar is fully dissolved. Add one-half teaspoon vanilla, and pour into slightly greased cups, putting a few kernels of popcorn in each. Set cups in a pan containing one inch of hot water. Bake in a slow oven, 325 degrees for 40 minutes, or until a knife inserted comes out clean. Top with a few more kernels of popcorn and serve.

Popcorn Cheese Balls: Run one and one-half cupfuls popcorn through a food chopper, using a coarse knife, and mix with one and one-half cupfuls grated American cheese. Season with salt and pepper; moisten with enough mayonnaise to make it stick together well. Roll into balls and then roll in plain popcorn which has been ground.

Popcorn Fudge: Combine two cupfuls brown sugar with one cup thin cream. Stir over low heat until the sugar is dissolved. Continue cooking to 238 degrees or until it forms a soft ball in cold water. Remove from heat, and let stand in cold water until cool. Then add one tablespoon butter, two cups popcorn and one teaspoon vanilla. Beat until creamy. Pour on buttered plate and cut into squares.*

Minnesota to Celebrate Her Diamond Jubilee

Minnesota will observe the seventy-fifth anniversay of the birth of the state with a diamond jubilee statewide celebration on May 12, Governor Floyd B. Olson announced recently.

It was on May 12, 1858, that the territory of Minnesota was granted statehood by an act of congress. The suggestion that the entire state join in a suitable observance of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the event was made to Governor Olson by A. B. Kapplin of Duluth, past state commander of the American Legion.

Governor Olson has adviced Mr. Kapplin that the suggestion has been adopted and that arrangements for the celebration have been turned over to the Minnesota Historical society. All residents of Minnesota will be invited to participate, while special programs will be sponsored in the schools, at public meetings and gathering of churches, fraternal bodies and labor groups.

Recognition of the diamond jubilee anniversary of Minnesota's statehood will probably be taken by the state legislature during the present session, Governor Olson indicated.

Minnesota first was owned by France, then by England and finally became part of the United States through the Louisiana purchase in 1803.

Minnesota was made a territory in 1849, with St. Paul as the capitol and Alexander Ramsey was the first governor. Henry Sibley was the first governor after Minnesota became a state in 1858.

Commencement Exercises at the Northwest School

Commencement week exercises at the Northwest School will open Friday, March 24, with the reception to members of the graduating class at the home of Supt. and Mrs. A. A. Dowell, and close with the graduation exercises the following Thursday.

The baccalaureate address will be delivered Sunday evening, March 26, by Dr. E. P. Robertson, President Emeritus of Wesley College, Grand Forks, and brother of the first superintendent of the Northwest School. His subject will be "Living the Golden Rule."

A concert recital by music students will be presented Monday evening under the direction of Miss Rose Polski, Mrs. Roy W. Hollander, and Miss Grace Warne.

Tuesday and Wednesday, Mar. 28 and 29, have been set aside for the senior class play, "Camille of Roaring Camp" to be presented under the direction of Miss Cynthia Weinberger.

Thursday, March 30, will be Commencement Day. Activities will open with the alumni dinner in the school dining hall at noon, followed by the senior class exercises in the afternoon, and graduation exercises in the evening. Director F. W. Peck, Agricultural Extension Division, St. Paul, will give the address of the evening. He will speak on "The Challenge to Youth," following which Superintendent A. A. Dowell will present diplomas to the 79 graduates.

The Roosevelt Cabinet

Secretary of State — Cordell Hull, a tall, serious Tennesseean; lawyer and former senator with economics and tariff his hobby; a tireless student who has spent most of his 61 years in public service. A democrat.

Secretary of the Treasury—William H. Woodin, a New York business executive who writes music and plays the guitar, generally conservative; a gentleman who can smile easily. A republican. He is 64.

Secretary of War—George H. Dern, a democrat who was twice governor of repulican Utah; a one-time captain of a football team who became a mining executive; rugged and 60.

Attorney General—Homer S. Cummings, a democrat from old republcan Connecticut; a keynoter at the convention that nominated Roosevelt for the vicepresidency and once chairman of the democratic national committee: a Stamford lawyer since 1893. Tall and 62.

Postmaster General—James A. Farley, 44, and "Big Jim" to many thousands; began learning about politics in Haverstraw, N. Y., and put the 1932 election "in the bag" in his own words long before the voters did; a bald, 215 pound giant who in spare moments has been a building supply executive. Democrat.

Secretary of the Navy—Claude A. Swanson, dean of the cabinet at 70 since the death of Thomas J. Walsh; except for four years as governor of his native Virginia has been in congress either as representative or senator ever since he went there 40 years ago; a gruff demeanored democrat who learned about the navy in congress and at the last disarmament conference.

Secretary of the Interior—Harold L. Ickes, a Chicago lawyer who was closely associated with the republican independent movement that centered about Mr. Theodore Roosevelt; 58 and a battler for lower utility rates; raises flowers in odd moments.

Secretary of Agriculture—Henry A. Wallace, a sturdy 44 year old son of a former republican agriculture secretary; a farm paper publisher who farms in the Iowa corn and hog belt; favors better prices for the farmers; talks frankly but not too much.

Secretary of Commerce—Daniel C. Roper, a Wilsonian democrat who waited 12 years in Washington for the tide to change; a South Carolinan who learned statistics, and organization practicing law; 65, with massive face and grizzled red hair.

Secretary of Labor—Frances Perkins, a lawyer and practical reformer who was in the Roosevelt New York cabinet; a New York sociologist who favors unemployment insurance and better conditions for workers, 49, and in private life is Mrs. Paul Wilson.

Preference

It isn't very nice to be hanged in effigy, but if we ever are hanged at all, we hope it will be in that manner. —Columbus Dispatch.

Flying Navy Church Flag

The navy church flag is in the shape of a pennant and is a blue cross on a white field. There are flags of three sizes, the smallest of which is 6 feet long and 2 feet wide. The length of the cross is 2 feet. The width of the cross at the base and top is 5 inches and the cross bar 14 inches. The head of the cross of the church flag should be placed toward the flagpole.

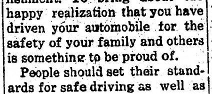
Muskrat Season Opens Tomorrow

Taking of muskrats in this section of the state is permissible between March 25 and April 5 this year. Both dates are inclusive. The season opens at noon on the opening day and closes at noon on the closing day.

No person shall set or use more than 50 traps for muskrats at any time, and no person shall set, visit or remove any trap for muskrats between the hours of 8 p. m. and 6 a. m., announces W. D. Stewart, director of the division of game and fish.



To accomplish a safe driving record for years is an accomplishment. To bring about the happy realization that you have driven your automobile for the safety of your family and others is something to be proud of.

People should set their standards for safe driving as well as for living. Once rules, regulations, or standards have been adopted, the average motorist should have the "guts" to stick to the standards he has set for himself.

"You cannot choose your battle fields,
The Gods do that for you;
But you can set a standard
Where a standard never flew."

Desserts for Foxes

On a fox farm near Los Angeles the animals seem to prefer fruit, especially oranges and apples. Foxes that are being raised for their pelts are fed a richer diet than the others and they are killed in December when their fur is at its best. The food given consists of bread and milk as a regular ration, with an occasional extra of eggs and raw meat with the fruit for dessert.

20 Years Ago

All Advertising:

20 years age, D. Payne advertised Lumber "& plenty of it"; S. S. Kolden, P & O Plows; and The Holt State Bank (B. L. Backe, cashier) wanted first mortgages on improved farms.

Among the flour merchants using advertising were Hanson & Barzen (Oscar Hanson, local manager), Red Lake Falls Mlg. Co. (N. Benoit, mgr.) and Holt Mercantile Co.

Carlson's used five-sixths of the back page to advertise their 5th Semi-Annual Sale. Some of the bargains were: Men's $10 suits for $5.95; men's $2.50 hats for $1.69; shoes for $1.95; 20 lbs. of sugar for $1.00, and 5-cent packages of garden seed for 1 cent.

Among the specialists were: Axel Nelson, General Blacksmith; Chas. W. Latta, Auctioneer; Dr. Charest, Physician & Surgeon; Dr. H. C. Hieber, ditto; O. A. Naplin, Attorney, and H. B. Newell, Veterinary Surgeon.

Among those who advertised final proof for homestead entry were Oscar A. Anderson, Levi Culver, Herman F. Brown, and Bertil E. Fridberg.

An auction sale was advertisrd for John F. Tapper; there were two probate notices (Anna Steinhauer and Kaersten Gronvald) and the local items were peppered with small notices, want ads., etc., etc.

But let's stop now before we are all crying. Them was the days for a small newspaper publisher!

Marshall County Boy Wins Honors at Northwest School

A Marshall county boy, Kermit Greenley, Viking, took a prominent part in the annual St. Patrick's day celebration staged on the campus during the past week. In connection with the special convocation program, Kermit reviewed the achievements of the class during the past year. Kermit has taken a prominent part in school activities since enrolling in the fall of 1929. He was a member of the state School of Agriculture championship football team, and was a member of the debate team that tied for the School of Agriculture championship this year. He will graduate with the advanced class at the close of the winter quarter when 79 graduates will receive their diplomas as graduates from the three and four year courses.

Beer Bill Passes

A regulatory beer measure was enacted by the Minnesota senate, 56 to 9, late Tuesday, with no specific alcoholic content mentioned, but a companion act was passed 53 to 9 shortly afterward prohibiting sale of liquor containing more than 3.2 per cent alcohol.

Larson Burns Out

Oslo had a big fire on Tuesday when two big business places were leveled to the ground. The fire started in the Barto pool hall which was a total loss and also destroyed the building next to it which Hans Larson and his brother were fixing up for a meat market and store. They saved all their equipment but were out the repair work and job of painting the interior of the building.

To the Cattle Owners of Marshall County:

On April 3, 1933, the state will start testing cattle in Marshall county, for the purpose of reaccrediting Marshall county for a period of three years. The test will be completed by April 16.

Only 20 per cent of the cattle in the county will be tested at this time, and this test will not be any expense to the county. All cost will be borne by the state.

Cattle owners are asked in all kindness to co-operate with the veterinarians and their helpers, please put in and tie up your stock when notified of the hour and day the tester and his helper will be at your farm. Please let them use your phone to call up your neighbors about the test. Every courtesy shown the tester and his helper will be fully appreciated.

Lady Blanche Farm

A Romance of the Commonplace

SYNOPSIS

Motoring through Vermont, Philip Starr, young Boston architect, meets Blanche Manning, seventeen, with whom he is immediately enamored. It being a long distance to Burlington, Starr's destination, Blanche suggests, the village of Hamstead not boasting a hotel, that he become, for the night, a guest of her cousin, Mary Manning. Mary receives Philip with true Vermont hospitality, and he makes the acquaintance of her cousin Paul, recognized as her fiance. Starr finds Mary is acquainted with Gale Hamlin, noted Boston architect, in whose office Philip is employed. He informs her of his desire to win Blanche for his wife. She tells him of an old family superstition concerning the "Blanches" of the Manning family. Paul Manning is inclined to be dissipated, not realizing Mary's true worth. Mary's reproaches for his undue "conviviality" are badly received by Paul, and the girl begins to have misgivings as to the wisdom of the alliance. Gale Hamlin, long a suitor for Mary's hand, visits Hamstead but makes no progress in his lovemaking. Philip, poring over records of the Manning family, learns the sorrowful story of the "Countess Blanche," French wife of a Revolutionary hero, Moses Manning, and of the peculiar "curse" she has transmitted to her descendants and the women of Hamstead. The evening of Philip's marriage to Blanche, Paul, under the influence of liquor, bitterly affronts Mary when she reproaches him for his condition, and tells her their engagement is ended.

CHAPTER VII

The lot in life of the girl who has been jilted is probably not very pleasant anywhere, but there is no place on earth where it is quite as hard as in a small country village. But Mary went about her usual occupations, after Blanche's wedding and the storm that followed it, with her head held high, and her back straighter than ever. She got, of course, no credit for this. It was set down against her that she had never really cared for Paul, after all, or she "would feel it more." Almost in the same breath she was accused by some one else—or even by the same person—of having worn her heart upon her sleeve, for all to see.

If village gossip was hard to bear, however, the family attitude was worse. Cousin Jane had a good deal to say about the inevitable fate of girls who ran after men who didn't want them, instead of attending their plain Christian duty. Seth said very little, but his silent, dejected attitude made his daughter feel more than any unkind words could have done, that he felt she had disgraced him almost beyond utterance. As for Violet, she became so violently "nervous" about the whole affair, that Mary dreaded to see her more than all the others put together. She never guessed that Paul was also suffering from his mother's "nerves."

"If you had the slightest consideration for me, you never would have let it happen," she lamented over and over again to her son. "My life is so full of grief and trouble that it takes a good deal of fortitude to bear it. Here is Blanche married—"

"You were tickled to death over that," muttered Paul.

"Paul! How can you be so vulgar! I tried to be cheerful, of course. But no one knows how I miss her. And Mary's money would have come in very handy, too."

"I didn't know Mary had any money."

"She will have, as soon as she's twenty-one, and that's very soon now. Laura had a little property of her own, and she left it all to Mary. I don't know as Mary knows it herself, but of course Seth will tell her soon, now."

But this was not the way Violet talked to Mary. She dwelt on the fact that the girl had not made herself "attractive enough" to Paul, that she was always neglecting to change her dress and tidy her hair, that she didn't join with him in those little pleasures that all young men like to "share with their fiancees."

"But Paul didn't expect to share them with me!" flared Mary, stung beyond endurance. "He didn't even want to! And I guess if you did all the cooking and cleaning and washing and ironing for four people, and took care of two children into the bargain, you wouldn't always look as nice as you do! Don't you suppose I've longed to be comfortable and rested—and pretty whenever Paul saw me? I guess I'm just as human as any other girl, and I guess I know 'the way to do things' just as well as you do."

"Well, I should manage to do them then, and to look well at the same time!" retorted Violet. "That's every woman's duty to herself."

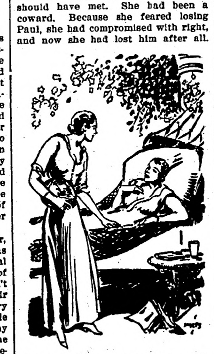
"What about her duty to her family, if the two conflict?"

"Mercy, Mary, what a temper you have! No wonder Paul couldn't stand it! I'm sure I do my duty to my family, if any woman ever did, but I keep myself up, too. If you had more system about your housework you could get it done all right—it's all in the way you do it."

Violet felt that she had come out ahead in this tilt. Nevertheless, it "used her up" to have Mary so shockingly impertinent to her, as she said to Jane in telling her about it afterwards, and she did not attack her in this same way again. Instead, she brought Blanche's letters and read them to her. And listening to these accounts of Blanche's happiness was, to Mary, like having salt rubbed in a raw wound.

Blanche was blissful, Philip was perfect, they were divinely happy, no two persons had ever loved each other so much before. And so on. Places and pastimes that had always been mere names, conjuring up visions of delight, to be sure, but never within the reach of "anyone we know" were a matter of course to Blanche. Not that Mary begrudged her that—she had, from the beginning, rejoiced wholeheartedly in her cousin's happiness. But didn't she deserve a little happiness, too? Mary was thoroughly human and she was very intelligent. She would have known how to squeeze not only enjoyment, but education, out of every drop of pleasure that she could have had. But this was not the worst of it. The man whom Blanche loved, wanted to lavish all these good things on her, while the man whom she, Mary, loved, had neglected and ignored her, and finally insulted her and cast her from him. Mary listened to Blanche's letters in silence, or said merely, "I'm glad she's having such a good time," in a low voice, but when Violet left her alone again, she always sat for a time clenching and unclenching her hands, dry little sobs of agony rising in her throat.

But hardest of all—harder than facing the village gossip, harder than facing Violet's complacence—was facing her own bruised pride, her own accusing conscience. Long ago—she knew it only too well—she should have told Paul that unless he mended his ways their engagement must end. She had evaded an issue which she should have met. She had been a coward. Because she feared losing Paul, she had compromised with right, and now she had lost him after all.



"Sylvia! You're—You're Not a Bit Well, Are You?"

She felt that she deserved her unhappiness, and this was more bitter than anything else except the way in which she had lost him. The thought of the words Paul had spoken to her in the hall that night after Blanche's wedding, the memory of his heavy breath and violent kisses, branded her with shame. She was cheapened, degraded in her own eyes, that any man should have dared to behave so to her, and that was infinitely worse than being cheapened and degraded in the eyes of her family. Had she, after all, deserved that, too?

In all those dreadful weeks, Mary found only two sources of comfort, besides the walks she took up Countess hill to gain solitude, and the prayers she managed, with shaken faith, to say. The first of these sources was Sylvia Gray. She was extremely fond of Mary, and usually saw a good deal of her, but she was not well enough to do that now. The neighborly visiting back and forth had been to a certain degree interrupted. But one afternoon, Sylvia phoned that she was "having a pretty good day," and that she wished Mary would bring her sewing and come over to supper.

It was, as usual, hard for Mary to break away from her family, but she spread out an appetizing cold supper on the table, covered it carefully, left the kettle boiling for Seth's evening cup of tea, and took the two little boys to the barn for their father to watch while he was milking. Seth did not altogether approve of this arrangement, but as usual, he said little, and she promised to be back early. She stopped a minute at the Old Gray homestead, where Mrs. Gray was sitting on her back porch, feeling instinctively that this kindly woman had spoken of her less harshly than most of her neighbors, and that she did not need to shun her; then went down the shady road that led to the little brick cottage where Sylvia and Austin lived. She found her lying in the hammock on her deep and sheltered piazza, looking, as always, supremely lovely, but also very frail. The expression on Sylvia's face shook Mary for the first time from the thought of her own troubles.

"Sylvia! You're—you're not a bit well, are you?"

"I'm perfectly all right. But I'm afraid I shall be tempted to pinch the twins, very gently, of course, sometimes, to make up for all the trouble they've caused me. Just think, they'll be the first twins in Hamstead since the Countess Blanche's—only mine are going to be both girls!"

Mary shivered a little. "Why do you keep talking about having twins?" she asked. "You'll have just one, another boy."

"You wait and see! But I didn't send for you to talk about twins. I've got a new scheme, and I want to see what you think of it. Now that David and Jacqueline have built that splendid cottage hospital, I think we've gone a long step forward in Hamstead. But after all, that only looks out for the people when they're sick or convalescent. I want to build something that will look out for them when they're well."

Mary dropped her sewing. "What do you mean?" she asked excitedly.

"Hamstead's the loveliest place in the world to live in," went on Sylvia, without apparent connection, "—that is, I think so. But I can imagine that I wouldn't have, when I was younger—especially if I'd been a boy. There isn't much to do."

"I see," said Mary, beginning to think that she did.

"And so, as long as there isn't, most boys try to find something. And what they find isn't always very good for them."

How much this kind, wise woman saw and understood and forgave! No wonder Austin worshiped her!

"I can't understand, myself," Sylvia went on, "why more parents don't send their boys away to good, really first-class schools and colleges. They don't seem to realize what a difference it would make, just at the age when it's perfectly natural and normal for a boy or girl to crave excitement and pleasure and activity and change. I'm a pretty good Episcopalian, but I believe just as many boys' souls have been saved by gymnasiums as by churches! And I want that nice new cousin of yours to start in on some plans for one as soon as he gets home from his wedding trip. I want it made suitable to use for dances, and want a billiard room, and a kitchen, and a swimming pool in it, too. I want. . . ."

"Oh, Sylvia, no one in the world would have thought of this but you!"

"Did you ever hear," went on Sylvia again without apparent connection, "how wild Austin was when he was young?"

"I—yes, I have—"

"That was before I knew him. But he was twenty-seven when I came here. If I'd grown up with him, loving him all the time—as of course I should have, for I loved him as much as I possibly could from the first moment I ever set eyes on him and never could help showing it—I suppose it would have hurt me dreadfully—to have him wild, I mean. I suppose I would have either mistaken immaturity for viciousness and condemned him when he had really done nothing to condemn, or excused viciousness for immaturity and forgiven him when he should, some way, have been punished. Either would have been equally bad, and equally likely to happen. We don't judge clearly when we're unhappy. Of course it hurts Austin and me a little, now, to think that he ever—slipped up at all. He and I have talked this plan over a good deal. He thinks it ought to help the fellows in Hamstead, some, anyway. Do you remember that poem by Coventry Patmore that Ruskin quotes,

> Ah, wasteful woman, she who may
> On her own sweet self set the price,
> Knowing man cannot choose but pay—
> How she has cheapened Paradise!
> How given for naught the priceless gift,
> How spoiled the bread and spilt the wine,
> Which, spent with due respective thrift,
> Had made brutes men and men divine!

"Isn't that what we're all tempted to do when we love a man—to walk straight into his arms, without knowing whether his arms are ready for us?"

"Or worthy?"

"If they're really ready, they will be worthy. That's just the point."

"I see," said Mary, very low indeed.

"And then," continued Sylvia, "Austin had ideals, always, even if he didn't live up to them. There's a tremendous difference between that and not having any ideals, not being able to see them yourself, and not having anyone care for you enough to give them to you. Austin's got a wonderful mother."

"So have your boys," said Mary, sobs rising in her throat.

There was no more direct allusion to her trouble than that.

No one but Sylvia in all Hamstead would have been clever enough to see that nothing would comfort Mary so much as to be able to think a little more gently of Paul. Indeed, no one else considered that she deserved comfort or that this would be a legitimate means of giving it to her if she had. But this comfort, great though it was, did not last indefinitely. After that talk with Sylvia, Mary found that she got through the days very well. But the nights seemed to grow harder and harder. Formerly, she had gone straight to sleep when she went to bed, because she was so tired. Now she was so utterly weary, mentally and spiritually as well as physically, that she could not sleep. And when she could not sleep, she cried—cried so violently that each morning found her more and more spent. Her overwrought nerves, seeking some means of relief, found only this one, and they were, just then, stronger than her will-power. And at last something snapped, suddenly, and she broke down openly in the middle of the bedtime songs that she always sang to her little brothers.

She had had a long hard day, and it seemed as if evening and the chance to rest would never come. When, on top of everything else, the small boys showed no disposition to settle down promptly for the night, she began to feel as if her self-control were slipping from her like a cast-off garment.

"I want a drink of water," announced Algy, bouncing up and down on his mattress.

Congress Passes Legislation Asked by President to End the Banking Crisis—Japanese Complete the Conquest of Jehol.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

EXPANSION of the currency to the extent of billions of dollars will result from the legislation which President Roosevelt asked of the extraordinary session of congress and which was enacted within a few hours after the new congress was convened on Thursday, March 9. The new currency is based not on gold, but on the liquid assets of the banks. The plan was devised after long hours of conference by the President, Secretary of the Treasury William H. Woodin and a number of financial advisers of the administration, and it was the main feature of their solution of the banking crisis that was paralyzing the nation.

Sec'y Woodin

The other chief points in the legislation which the President called for in his brief but spirited message were:

Continued suspension of gold payments and embargo on exports of gold.

Clothing of the President with the powers of a financial dictator.

Continuation of the national banking holiday, wholly or in part, pending complete reopening of the banks.

Legalization of the bank holiday proclamation of March 5 and all measures adopted by the treasury to carry it into effect.

Because the new currency is not backed by gold it is called federal reserve bank notes to distinguish it from federal reserve notes which are backed by gold.

To what extent if any, inflation of the currency will be produced by this increase in the volume of money was one of the big questions involved in the Roosevelt plan.

That inflation will be the consequence was a conclusion widely reached in financial and commercial circles, with the result that a leap upward of commodity and security prices was looked for the moment the exchanges reopen.

The act creating the new currency liberalizes the provisions of the Glass-Steagall act by allowing banks to issue notes with no gold reserve behind them. The notes thus issued are backed only by United States bonds in the same manner as national bank notes issued by national banks. It further liberalizes section 10a of the federal reserve act as amended by the Glass-Steagall act so as to enable banks to obtain currency on "liquid assets" of a character not previously eligible.

One of the effects of the legislation will be to produce a unified banking system. Only member banks of the federal reserve system are able to avail themselves of the privileges afforded by this legislation to convert assets previously ineligible into currency. State banks are compelled to join the federal system in order to obtain the funds that will enable them to reopen.

Another foreseen effect is the weeding out of weak banks. Institutions unable to furnish liquid assets for currency will be unable to reopen. Others will be able to remain open to the extent of their liquidity pending at least a recovery of general public confidence in banks.

Legislation to stop hoarding also was considered by congress and measures for reaching and punishing the hoarders of currency whose withdrawal of deposits brought on the panic and caused the closing of the banks were discussed by the administration and leaders of the senate and house. As a preliminary move in this direction the federal reserve board at the instance of Mr. Roosevelt, sent telegraphic orders to all federal reserve banks to furnish by March 13, lists of persons who have withdrawn gold since February 1, and had not by that time redeposited their gold withdrawals.

FOR days there was considerable confusion concerning the banking situation mainly because of differences between the President's proclamation and the orders issued by governors of various states. This was especially true in New York and Illinois. Day by day Secretary Woodin issued orders modifying those in the government's proclamation closing down all banks, but there was much misunderstanding of his regulations regarding limiting opening of the institutions. Clearing houses were busy holding meetings but failed to live up to their name by clearing up the situation and the banks were uncertain of both their powers and their responsibilities.

In many cities and towns banks were open to carry on limited activities that were required to provide food, foodstuffs and medicines and for the meeting of pay rolls. Throughout the country preparations were made for the issuance of scrip, pending the receipt of the necessary authority from Washington. Secretary Woodin, however, ruled against scrip, though he sanctioned the issuance in various localities of clearing house certificates against sound assets of banks for use as an emergency circulating medium.

Despite all the confusion and inconvenience, the American public remained fairly calm and appeared to have confidence in President Roosevelt and his advisers. The general feeling was that the vigorous new Chief Executive would be able to devise competent measures for temporary relief of the situation and to force their adoption by congress.

Following the enactment of the legislation for the reopening of the banks the President asked congress for authority to cut an estimated $500,000,000 out of government expenditures by cutting government salaries up to 15 per cent, and by drastic reductions in payments to veterans. It is expected that another $200,000,000 will be saved by the reorganization and combining of many government departments, authorization for which was passed in the closing days of the last congress.

DEMOCRATIC membership of 313 in the house of representatives gives them an unwieldy majority, and the certain consequence is intra-party wrangling. At present the control seems to be in the hands of Speaker Henry Rainey and two allies, Floor Leader Byrns and Representative Cullen, leader of the Tammany delegation from New York. Opposed to them is a faction headed by McDuffie of Alabama, who sought vainly to be elected speaker. It was said several of the Alabaman's most active supporters were quietly informed that they would be punished by being shifted from important committees to minor assignments.

Speaker Rainey

Senator James Hamilton Lewis of Illinois was elected whip of the Democratic majority in the senate, and Senator Joe Robinson of Arkansas was chosen to be senate leader. Also party authority was made stronger than it has been for many years. The caucus agreed that the vote of any future caucus upon any measure recommended by the President should be binding upon all except those who excused themselves from voting for cause. It was further agreed that a simple majority, instead of the more customary two-thirds majority, should make the action of the caucus binding and that two-thirds of the whole number of Democratic senators should constitute a caucus.

The caucus further chose Senator Kendrick of Wyoming as assistant leader, Senator Key Pittman as Democratic candidate for president pro tempore, Edward Halsey as candidate for secretary of the senate, Chesley W. Jurney as candidate for sergeant at arms, and L. L. Biffle as secretary to the majority.

DURING its brief special session that convened on inaugural day the senate confirmed these appointments by the President:

Prof. Raymond Moley of Columbia as an assistant secretary of state.

William Phillips of Massachusetts, as undersecretary of state, who will be directly in charge and accountable to Secretary Hull.

Wilbur J. Carr of New York, reappointed as assistant secretary of state.

William F. Stevenson of South Carolina, member of the federal home loan bank board.

T. Dwight Webb of Tennessee, member of the home loan board.

FOLLOWING out the campaign plan devised by Lieut. Gen. Kuniaki Koiso, the Japanese armies virtually completed the conquest of the province of Jehol. The Chinese governor fled and all the Chinese troops were forced out after a last defensive struggle at Koupeikow, a pass in the Great Wall. Japanese planes first bombed the Chinese positions there, and then General Kawahara's brigade took the place. The Japanese thus completed the seizure of 250 miles of the Great Wall, extending from the inner Mongolia to the Yellow sea.

Gen. Kuniaki Koiso

The Chinese fled toward Peiping and the confusion and fright in that city led the authorities to establish martial law. The Japanese said they would not push on to Peiping unless forced to by reprisals against their countrymen in that city. Marshal Chang Hsueh-liang was severely criticized for the loss of Jehol and resigned as military overlord of North China, accepting the blame and asking that the national government relieve him of all posts.

Maxim Litvinov, foreign commissar of Russia, bluntly informed the League of Nations that the Soviet government would not participate in the doings of the league committee set up to handle the Sino-Japanese quarrel.

Deaths From Accidents Show Small Decrease

For 1932 North Dakota had the lowest motor vehicle death rate—8.8 per 100,000 population; Nevada had the highest—57.7.

Medford, Mass., population 64,300, was the largest reporting city to go through the entire year without a motor vehicle death.

Milwaukee had the lowest motor vehicle fatality rate of all large cities—13.6 per 100,000 population; Los Angeles had the highest, 32.6.

There were 8,500,000 nonfatal injuries last year. In other words, one person out of every fourteen was hurt in an accident.

There were nearly as many accidental deaths in homes as in traffic, and more injuries in the home than in traffic.

The accident death rate for 1932, 70.5 per 100,000 population, is the lowest on record except for 1921 and 1922.

Falls and burns were responsible for 60 per cent of all home deaths last year.

Nearly one-third of all home accidental deaths involved children under fifteen years of age.

Deaths from drowning and firearms show practically no change from year to year, despite all the educational work done to reduce them.—From Accident Facts, Issued by the National Safety Council.

How to train BABY'S BOWELS

Babies, bottle-fed or breast-fed, with any tendency to be constipated, would thrive if they received daily half a teaspoonful of this old family doctor's prescription for the bowels.

That is one sure way to train tiny bowels to healthy regularity. To avoid the fretfulness, vomiting, crying, failure to gain, and other ills of constipated babies.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is good for any baby. For this, you have the word of a famous doctor. Forty-seven years of practice taught him just what babies need to keep their little bowels active, regular; keep little bodies plump and healthy. For Dr. Caldwell specialized in the treatment of women and little ones. He attended over 3500 births without loss of one mother or baby.

Joined Her in Looking for the Fire Escape

Two lady school teachers from Brooklyn, spending their sabbatical year exploring western Canada, stopped at a small and old-fashioned hotel in Alberta recently.

One of the pair was inclined to be worrisome when traveling, and she couldn't rest until she had made a tour of the corridors to hunt out exits in case of fire. The first door she opened, unfortunately, turned out to be that of the public bath, occupied by an elderly gentleman taking a shower.

"Oh, excuse me!" the lady stammered, flustered. "I'm looking for the fire escape." Then she ran for it.

To her dismay, she hadn't got far along the corridor when she heard a shout from behind her and, looking around, saw the gentleman, wearing only a towel, running after her. "Where's the fire?" he hollered.—Washington Labor.

How I Broke Into The Movies

Copyright by Hal C. Herman

By WALLACE BEERY

I DIDN'T break into the movies. I was drafted into them. I can't think of anything worse than playing the part of a Swedish housemaid. And that is the first part I ever had in moving pictures.

I can't tell about the hardships I endured as an extra because I never played as one. Sometimes I think that is an awful drawback to my career, not being able to give one of those success yarns on how I labored through weary years as an extra before getting my first part. But anyhow, I can tell of hardships I went through in struggling about before the camera in skirts before I graduated from the housemaid role, and I don't know but that has an extra's tribulations outclassed any way you take it.

It didn't take me long to realize that I wanted to get into the show business. I decided that when I saw my first circus. Consequently I left home and joined the Ringling Brothers' circus when I was sixteen years old. You see, I got into moving pictures through a process of elimination. I tried out other branches of the show business before I found the one I wanted to stick with.

The novelty of being guardian to a herd of circus elephants at a salary of $3 a week wore off, but I stuck with the job for two years.

Wallace Beery.

Then I did a little serious thinking. No, that is not one of my comedy gags. I really do think seriously now and then. I remember how entranced all of the people in my home county in Missouri had been by my voice in hog calling contests. There must have been some cause for that, I reasoned.

So I went to New York to try out my voice on a new audience. There I was told I had a good singing voice and was given a place in Henry Savage's musical comedy organization. I stuck to this phase of the show business for several years and became Savage's star comedian.

Then came my introduction into the movies. I was playing with a musical company in Chicago when Henry McRae Webster, director general of the Essanay Film company, saw me. I don't know what he thought and I am perfectly willing not to know. It might be vanity.

Anyway, he cornered me after the show and by the time he got through talking I was a moving picture player. I started to say actor, but that wouldn't be correct. For what did Webster do but deck me out in skirts and make a housemaid out of me. I haven't liked them since—skirts, I mean.

Still, wearing skirts and a long blond wig had its compensations. For one thing, I could live in one place and I could have my evenings free.

I played most every sort of comedy role with Essanay and then came a real break for me. I was sent to the West coast. There I joined the Keystone organization and played for a year in Sennett comedies. Again I missed the extra player grind but I was given most every sort of part.

You might say that by this time I had "broken into" the movies but it was not until after I had returned from a trip to Japan, where I took a company to make a series of pictures, that I feel I actually did that. I was given the dramatic role of the villain in Marshall Neilan's "Unpardonable Sin," and the critics and public were kind enough to say that I made a very good bad man.

It seemed for a while then that I was doomed to be a villain for the rest of my days. I played all sorts of heavy parts and had just about decided that I couldn't be anything but a rogue on the screen no matter how bad I wanted to be good.

Then a break of luck came out of a clear sky, and with Ray Hatton, I enjoyed playing in a long series of comedy pictures. Among them an air picture which has made of me a real aviation enthusiast.

Two of my latest parts were in "The Champ," and "Grand Hotel," and I am grateful to the public and critics for their approval of my work in these plays.

All-Conquering Motor to Supersede Railway?

Can old railway tracks, no longer required for their original purpose, be made useful once more?

This is a question which railway engineers often ask; and as old branch lines close down owing to lack of traffic it becomes a very practical one.

An answer to it has been found in the United States, where experts are advocating that obsolescent railway tracks should be converted into roads for heavy motor traffic. They say that the cost of transforming an old railway line into a modern road would be less than a third that of constructing an entirely new highway. The state would therefore be able to buy disused tracks from the railway companies at quite a substantial figure and still show a profit.

The value of the idea, of course, depends on whether or not new roads are needed. If and where they are the scheme has possibilities.—London Answers.

JOHNNY MUSKRAT TO BROADCAST ON SEVEN STATIONS

Johnny Muskrat, broadcaster on fur trapping and fur marketing for the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation, is a mighty busy man these days. Not only does he give fur talks from station WLS, Chicago, as he has for several years, but also makes hurry-up trips to Minneapolis to talk to trappers over station WCCO. In addition Johnny is writing fur market letters for stations KJR Seattle; KMBC Kansas City; WCAU Philadelphia; KOA Denver, and WFAA Dallas, which will be broadcast regularly during the fur season.

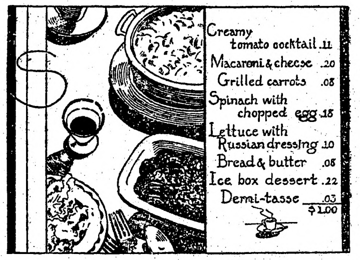
El Comancho.

Johnny Muskrat draws on a lifetime of actual experience in instructing trappers how to catch furs, how to correctly prepare them for sale, and when to ship them. The Foundation has found these talks to be useful not only for informing trappers on fur market conditions from day to day but also in helping them take more and better furs.

In addition to telling of his own experiences, Johnny frequently broadcasts the interesting letters he receives from his trapper friends. Occasionally, one of his old friends drops into the studio and is introduced to the radio audience. Among the interesting characters to be introduced by Johnny at various times during the present season will be El Comancho, noted writer and authority on outdoor and pioneer life. El Comancho is also scheduled to officiate as one of the Fur Show judges when the prize winning pelts are to be selected.

In spite of all his radio duties Johnny finds time to keep track of entries for the First National Fur Show and reports that judging by those pelts already received the show should be a truly wonderful exhibition of the trapper's skill in skinning, stretching, and drying pelts.

A $1 Dinner for 4



IT isn't much to spend—but it's a lot to eat. This dinner is not only inexpensive and delicious but it is generous in food value because it is dietetically sound. Let's see what is in it of special value. Tomatoes, in the cocktail contain a vitamin which helps us to get iron out of other foods, and spinach contains some of this iron. So do carrots contain iron. Lettuce is that leafy vegetable which is so essential in its calcium content for our teeth as well as for our general health. Clip it out and add it to your list of delicious thrift dinners.

Creamy Tomato Cocktail: Have the contents of a 12½-ounce can of tomato juice and one-half of a six-ounce can of evaporated milk very cold. Pour tomato juice slowly into the milk, season with salt and pepper. Serve at once.

Orange Ice Box Dessert: Add one-fourth cup of orange juice and two tablespoons of lemon juice to one-half the contents of a 14-ounce can of condensed milk. Soften one-half teaspoon gelatin in one tablespoon cold water; dissolve over hot water and add to the milk. Add two tablespoons chopped walnuts. Put a layer of split lady fingers in a mold, add half of the milk mixture. Put another layer of lady fingers, add the rest of the milk mixture and top with more lady fingers. Chill for 12 to 24 hours. Turn out and slice.*

Peaches Down Georgia Way

GEORGIA is a land of clay-roads and peaches. But you'll be willing to drive over red-clay roads, even in rainy season, if they lead you to an old Southern Inn for supper—it's always "supper" after 6 P.M. in Georgia. Baked ham and grits, corn bread and country butter and probably a steamed peach pudding for dessert—these things linger longer in memory than nine-course hotel dinners elsewhere.

The above dessert, by the way, is probably the great-grandmother to the new Peach Mousse as they make it in the East, but it is a worthy ancestor. Here are recipes for each of these desserts, and they can be made in April as well as in peach-time.

Two Peachy Desserts

Steamed Peach Pudding, Southern Style: Sift two cups of flour, four teaspoons baking powder and one teaspoon salt. Work in four tablespoons shortening and add seven-eighths cup of milk to make a soft dough. Drain one No. 2½ can of peaches well and cut in rather large slices. Put in the bottom of a well-buttered baking dish. Sprinkle with two tablespoons of brown sugar and put the dough on top. Steam one hour, being careful not to lift the cover of the steamer in that time. When done, turn upside-down so that the peaches are on top. Serve with plain cream.

Peach Mousse: Whip two cups of heavy cream. Drain the juice from a No. 2 can of peaches and mash well, or run through a food chopper. Add to the cream. Add one cup of confectioner's sugar and one-fourth teaspoon of ground cloves, and fold in the stiffly-beaten whites of two eggs. Pack in molds or in the ice-cream container, without the paddle. Surround with salt and ice, using two parts ice to one part salt. Let stand for four hours.*

Reminder of Dark Age

Witch-burning days in Scotland were recalled when a human skull was found during excavations at the Bogle hole, Mullesburgh. The Bogle hole was one of the places in Scotland where witches were burned after trial It was known in 1561 as the Terror's Croft. The last recorded trial of persons accused of witchcraft was held in Musselburgh on July 29, 1661.

Earth's Elevations

The highest point in the world is in Asia, Mount Everest, being 29,141 feet; the highest point in South America is Mount Aconcagua, 23,080 feet; in North America it is Mount McKinley, 20,300 feet; in Africa, Kilimanjuro (Kibo peak); Europe, Mont E Bruz, 18,465; while the highest point in Australia, Mount Kosciusko, has an elevation of only 7,323 feet.

Law's Slow Process

A fortune of $150,000 which has been lying in chancery in England for almost a century, has just been divided between two brothers and a sister. It was in 1839 that this money passed into the care of chancery. Attempts had previously been made to recover it, but it is only now that a claim has been established.

A Country Editor Looks at Banking

"With rents falling and unpaid, real estate does not present a happy picture. Nor does the owner of carefully selected bonds feel any happier, with a bunch of them going wrong. A lot of folks very carefully invested in preferred and common stocks in the finest companies in the world and have seen them fall to perhaps a tenth of what they paid for them, and no dividends at all. Some folks kept their money in savings accounts in banks, and some banks have closed and left them high and dry. But the situation is worth looking at very carefully.

"On government authority, most banks that closed were really solvent but for frozen assets and popular timidity. Gradually the closed banks are coming out from under and depositors in even bad cases will get at least 50 per cent of their savings. That's tough of course; nobody likes to lose half of what they had scrimped and sacrificed and saved. But when you hoard and stick the roll of bills in a coffee pot or under a mattress, some plug-ugly comes along and burns your feet till you tell him to take it and welcome.

"And what about the great majority of banks that weathered the storm, met all comers and are doing business as usual, carefully and conservatively, but safely? What about the savings in those banks? They are a full 100 per cent today—and they are the only thing we know of at 100 per cent anywhere. After all is said and done, a good, well managed bank is still the best place in all the world for money or savings. Right now in Ohio the banks pay the taxes on all savings and pay their depositors net interest on their savings. We can't think, just now, of many other investments that are a tenth as safe as a savings account in a solid bank. Why, even a savings account in a closed bank is actually worth more today than most stocks."

Minnesota's New Prohibition Act

Minnesota's new Prohibition Act leaves much to be desired, but it has one thing in its favor. The Act is not self repealing. In the event that the Eighteenth Amendment is repealed before another Legislature meets, Minnesota will not be left without an enforcement statute.

Wet leaders were wise in permitting a form of prohibition to remain as Minnesota's law until some substitute has been agreed on. The old Enforcement Act carried an automatic repeal clause, making it all void in case the Federal Amendment ceased to be in effect. The substitute Enforcement Bill offered this time, to make the 3.2 per cent limit effective in Minnesota, also carried a repeal clause, until that clause was stricken from the Bill in its final stages.

So Minnesota will remain, well, not exactly dry, for another two years, but at least it will not become sopping wet, with county option dry spots. It will be uniformly moist as to beer, save where cities and villages may refuse to license dispensaries of beer.

The new Enforcement Act is far more lenient to the bootlegger and his ilk than the laws in effect for the last thirteen years, however. It abolishes the forfeiture of stills and other booze making machinery. It eliminates the forfeiture of motor vehicles used in illegal transportation. It leaves out even the forfeiture of liquor seized. It omits all the machinery of the abatement law, under which premises used repeatedly for law violations may be padlocked.

All these are penalties that hurt. Then the "fine and imprisonment" feature of the state law is changed to "fine or imprisonment," which makes it possible for a prosperous bootlegger to get off with a mere money payment, meaning little in his summing up of costs.

Such changes are evidence of a tendency to go easier on the violators of the law, on all the peddlers of hard liquor. It is an unfortunate let down, which may have bad effects.

The coming months are important times of decision as to the future of the liquor problem. Prohibition has had a trial. Modification comes next. Repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment is about to be submitted. The future trend of sentiment will depend to a large extent on the way the business is handled under the new laws and ordinances.—The Minneapolis Journal.

Celebrated Golden Wedding

Friends of Mr. and Mrs. Nils Sordal gathered at their home Sunday afternoon, March 19, tendering them a surprise, the occasion being their 50th wedding anniversary as well as Mrs. Sordal's 80th birthday. A program had been prepared beginning with a prayer by Soren Moe, after which short talks were made by Ingvald Wold and Ole Ose and songs were sung. The honored couple was presented with a beautiful silver set from their friends. A delicious lunch was served by the self-invited guests, feature of which was a big wedding cake which formed the centerpiece of the table.

Mr. and Mrs. Sordal were married fifty years ago in Sordal, Norway. They came to America from Aurdal Sogn, Norway, and settled on a homestead in Agdar township 31 years ago, making their home there since. Six children were born to them, four of whom are now living in Canada, one in Michigan, and another of whom is at the Oakland Park sanatorium at Thief River Falls.—The Times, T.R.F.

Olson Lifts Penalty on Tax

Governor Floyd B. Olson last week signed a bill permiting payment without penalty of the taxes due last year. Under the act, the 1931 taxes, payable last year may be paid this year without penalty or interest. If more than 50 per cent is paid this year, the remainder also may be paid in 1934 without penalty. If less than 50 per cent is paid the remaider may be paid next year with penalty and interest.

The sixth graders made History booklets this week on "Old Civilizations."

In the seventh grade Arithmetic review of profit and loss Glenn was the the only one with a perfect score.

We are glad to hear that Lowell is getting better. His classmates in the seventh grade wrote letters to him Tuesday.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

Last year 3,850 people were killed when the automobile in which they were riding left the roadway.

By that I mean that the driver deliberately drove off the roadway either while sleeping or from some other unknown cause. If you must leave the roadway pick out a spot where the road is level, the ditch not too deep, and a good clear field ahead so that you can have plenty of time to wake up.

It is dangerous to drive while sleepy and my recommendation is to park your car on a side-road—take a snooze—and after a good sleep proceed on your way wide awake and in safety.

T. B. Retest of Cattle

Marshall county will again be under a modified quarantine, commencing April 1, 1933, when a retest of Marshall county cattle will again be made to re-accredit the county as a Tuberculosis free are by the Minnesota State Livestock Sanitary Board, according to G. A. Sustad, of Viking, secretary of the Marshall County Tuberculosis committee.

Veterinarians from the state livestock sanitary board will invade the county in eight teams commencing Monday, April 3 to re-test the cattle in the county and will remain here until April 16, when they expect to complete the work, said Mr. Sustad. Only 20 per cent of the cattle will be tested this time, and the test will be scattered into practically all sections of the county.

The re-test in Marshall county is being done under the expense of the state, and not upon the individual taxpayer of the county, said Mr. Sustad. This is following out state law on tuberculin testing of cattle, the county contributing to the cost of the initial test which was completed three years ago.

"Cattle owners are asked in all kindness to cooperate with the veterinarians and their helpers," Mr. Sustad urged in the announcement of the retest. "Please put in and tie up your stock when notified of the hour and the day that the tester will be at your farm. Please let them use your phone to call up your neighbor about the test. Any courtesy shown to the tester and his helper will be fully appreciated."

Team No. 3 will test 2 herds in Holt township, 36 in Excell, 1 in New Solum, 1 in East Valley 1 in Newfolden, 2 in New Maine, 1 in East Park and 1 in Lincoln.

Land Values Drop Over 20 Per Cent In Minnesota

The average value of an acre of land in Minnesota for taxation purposes in 1932 dropped more than twenty per cent from the 1930 figure, according to an announcement made by the state tax commission.

In 1932 the average assessed value per acre was $12, a drop of $3.51 from 1930, when the value was $15.51. Of the 87 counties, Ramsey, with $60.11 had the highest assessed value per acre in the state. Hennepin was second with $36.38.

The following figures show the average 1932 assessed value of land per acre in some of the northern counties as compared with 1930.

Counties, Years, —	1930	1932
Marshall,	$6.82	$5.51
Roseau,	3.77	2.93
Pennington,	7.68	6.54
Kittson,	8.19	6.31
Polk,	17.26	13.75

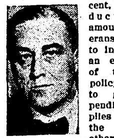
News Review of Current Events the World Over

Congress Quickly Acts on President Roosevelt's Request for New Legislation—Reopening of Banks Spurs Upturn in Business Activities.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S request to congress that he be given authority to make cuts in the salaries of government employees up to 15 per cent, and to make reductions in the amounts paid to veterans, that authority to include practically an entire revamping of the government policy as it applies to government expenditures, as it applies to veterans of the World war and other wars, met with a quick response on the part of the house of representatives and the senate.



President Roosevelt

The bill passed the senate by a vote of 62 to 13. Forty-three Democrats and nineteen Republicans voted for the measure; four Democrats and nine Republicans against it.

The vote in the house was 266 for the measure and 138 against it. That result was not achieved without difficulty, and the difficulty came in the ranks of the President's party, and its passage would not have been possible without the aid of Republican members of the house. In a party caucus 92 Democratic members bolted the President's leadership and voted against the measure, their opposition being to that portion of the bill giving the President dictatorial powers in the matter of expenditures for veterans. At the final roll call, 197 Democrats and 69 Republicans voted for the bill, and 92 Democrats, 41 Republicans and five Farmer-Laborites against it. Several members who were opposed to the bill but who did not wish to be recorded as against an economy measure, decided not to vote.

An analysis of the vote shows that 68 per cent of the Democrats voting and 62 per cent of the Republicans stood by it, but leaders said that the Democratic percentage for the measure would have been much lower had not a parliamentary maneuver been invoked to prevent rebellious members of the party caucus from going through with their plans.

Still another factor was credited with part of the favorable vote, and that was the word passed around the house cloakrooms that President Roosevelt planned to denounce the opposition in a nation-wide radio broadcast if the bill had failed of approval.

It is believed the President will make a saving of approximately $385,000,000 in the expenditures for veteran relief by cutting out all men whose disability, on which claims for relief are based, was not the result of war service. The reduction in the salaries of government employees is expected to save approximately another $150,000,000.

In the senate an effort was made to delay the passage of the act by proposing amendments and the senate chamber resounded to the oratory of friends of the veteran and of federal employees, battling, against certain and overwhelming odds, to win some amendment to the bill.

WHILE the President has received Republican aid in securing desired legislation for his banking, economy and beer program, he will probably not be able to depend upon it to the same extent at least for his farm program. That contemplates giving the President dictatorial powers in so manipulating the price of farm products to bring them up to what is termed a "parity" price. The contemplated law would authorize the President, acting through the secretary of agriculture, to fix a parity price of each farm product; that is, a price at which the producer of the product would be placed on a parity with the producer of manufactured articles. For example, the secretary of agriculture might declare $1 a bushel to be the parity price of wheat. The object then would be to manipulate the price of wheat upward until the desired parity price should be reached.

Secretary Wallace

In order to raise the prices of farm products the secretary of agriculture under the terms of the bill would invoke various devices. He might employ the domestic allotment plan to influence the prices of one group of commodities and the government land leasing plan in the case of another group.

Secretary Wallace insists that it would not be a price fixing law for the reason that no price would be fixed by fiat. Instead, a price would be declared to aim at and the measures adopted would be those judged most likely to raise the price to the point desired.

The products covered in the contemplated law are wheat, corn, cotton, cattle, sheep, hogs, milk, dairy products, tobacco and rice.

Along with this the President proposes the scaling down of farm mortgages and a reduction in the interest rates through agricultural credit agencies, all of which are to be consolidated under the direction of Henry Morgenthau, Jr.

BANKS began opening for business on March 13. On that date only banks connected with the Federal Reserve system and located in Federal Reserve bank cities opened their doors under licenses from the Treasury department. Banks in all clearing house cities that had applied for and been issued licenses either by the federal treasury or, in the case of state banks, by state banking departments, began opening on Tuesday, and those in the smaller cities and towns on Wednesday.

There were no restrictions placed on the banks in the way of limiting withdrawals, except where the depositor was attempting to secure sums that would indicate hoarding, when the person making the withdrawal was required to state his purpose and give his name and address.

The banks were also required not to pay out gold or gold certificates, the embargo the President had placed on gold being continued, and vast amounts of the metal were being returned to the banks. Up to March 13 it was estimated the Federal Reserve bank in New York had received more than $100,000,000 of hoarded gold and in Chicago more than $23,000,000 had been returned. The returns throughout the nation indicated a larger amount of gold brought back to the banks than the total withdrawal of the metal since February 1, though the government did not give out any definite statement on the subject.

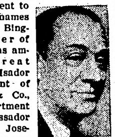
It was after the President had repeated and emphasized the embargo he had placed on gold payments that Governor Blood of Utah signed a bill passed by the legislature requiring "the treasurer of the state of Utah and of each taxing subdivision within the state to pay all public employees under their jurisdiction in gold coin."

Where will Utah get the gold?

The President, in a published statement and also in a national broadcast, detailed in simple language the reasons for the national bank holiday and the plans for opening. He was careful to emphasize the point that the time of opening any bank was not determined by its relative condition, but by the ability of the officials of the Federal Reserve banks and of the Treasury department to make the proper check for the issuing of licenses. He explained that banks that were not sound would not be permitted to open except under government supervision for the purpose of reorganizing them.

The reopened banks were supplied with a liberal allowance of the new currency based on bank assets, but in practically no case was any of this needed as the deposits exceeded the withdrawals, and in many cases the new currency was returned to the Federal Reserve banks.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT took time out from the urging of new legislation to give some consideration to the filling of important diplomatic posts. He has sent to the senate the names of Robert Worth Bingham, publisher of Louisville, Ky., as ambassador to Great Britain; Jesse Isador Straus, president of R. H. Macy & Co., New York department store, as ambassador to France, and Josephus Daniels, war secretary of the navy, under whom Mr. Roosevelt served as assistant secretary, as ambassador to Mexico.



Jesse I. Straus

At least one of these will meet with some opposition in the senate. Senator Arthur Robinson (Rep., Ind.) announced that he would offer evidence that Mr. Bingham had made speeches in England which caused him to be labeled as "apologetic American.".

Advisers of the President, however, declared that he was fully satisfied that Mr. Bingham will assert and defend America's position on all issues emphatically and patriotically.

WORLD war veterans, the U. S. Supreme court decided, are without priority over other depositors in the claims against insolvent banks for the money received from the United States. The ruling was handed down in a case involving a deposit of approximately $6,000 which Sam Spicer had in the Hargis Bank and Trust company of Breathitt county, Kentucky, when it became insolvent.

The assets of the bank were not sufficient to pay all depositors, and it was contended that money received from the United States by veterans for insurance and disability allowances was money of the United States while on deposit in banks to the credit of veterans and was therefore entitled to priority. The Supreme court decided otherwise.

A TORNADO swept the Tennessee-Kentucky border from the Mississippi river to the Cumberland mountains, killing 30 persons, injuring more than 200 and did damage estimated at $1,000,000.

WITH a special message of only 72 words—the shortest Presidential message ever written—the President secured legislation amending the Volstead act and making 3.05 per cent beer legal in the United States. The President's 72 words were:

"I recommend to the congress the passage of legislation for the immediate modification of the Volstead act, in order to legalize the manufacture and sale of beer and other beverages of such alcoholic content as is permissible under the Constitution; and to provide through such manufacture and sale, by substantial taxes, a proper and much needed revenue for the government.

"I deem action at this time to be of the highest importance."

The beer bill provides for an alcoholic content of not over 3.05 per cent, for a tax of $5 a barrel, for a license fee of $1,000 for each brewery, and the law to be effective 15 days after it is signed by the President, which means beer will be on sale shortly after the first of April.

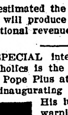
The bill was passed by a strictly non-partisan vote. In the house 238 Democrats voted for it and 58 against; 73 Republicans for and 39 against, and 5 Farmer-Labor for. Twenty members did not vote, and there are two vacancies.

Kansas was the only state whose representatives voted solidly against the bill, while the representatives of 18 states voted all wet.

The senate amended the house bill to include wine, to make the alcoholic content of both 3.05 instead of 3.2 and to prohibit sale to children under sixteen years of age. The vote in the senate was 43 for the bill and 30 against, also along strictly non-partisan lines.

It is estimated the $5 a barrel tax on beer will produce about $125,000,000 additional revenue.

OF SPECIAL interest to Roman Catholics is the allocution delivered by Pope Pius at the secret consistory inaugurating the holy year. His holiness issued a warning that communism is attempting to exploit the world's political and economic disorders and expressed a fervent wish for disarmament and settlement of war debts. The pontiff bestowed the Roman purple on six new cardinals of the church and announced that two others would be elevated later. The six elevated were: Pietro Fumasoni-Biondi, former apostolic delegate at Washington; Archbishop Villeneauve of Quebec, Angelo Dolci, Archbishop Innitzer of Vienna, Archbishop Costa of Florence and Archbishop Fossati of Turin.



Pope Pius

Second only to the "nefarious propaganda of communists" which, he said, threatens Christian civilization, the pontiff deplored proselyting activities of Protestant sects in Italy and Rome. He describes these activities as being "impudently pursued" and urged all the faithful to co-operate against "this menace and defend the treasured riches of city and nation."

PLANS for immediate reconstruction and rehabilitation are well under way in Los Angeles and its suburbs, where earth tremors caused 115 deaths and property damage estimated at $75,000,000. An appeal has been made to the federal government and the Reconstruction Finance corporation for the majority of funds needed for rebuilding. Congress passed a bill, introduced by Senator William G. McAdoo of Los Angeles, for an emergency appropriation of $5,000,000 to relieve immediate distress in the stricken area.

The earthquake will probably give to science the first accurate records of just how the earth shakes during such a disaster, information which may be highly valuable in constructing buildings to withstand earthquakes in the future.

THE French cabinet is sounding out the members of the chamber of deputies in an attempt to whip up a majority in favor of paying the $19,261,432 war debt installment to the United States which was defaulted on December 15.

Former Premier Herriot has been lobbying in the government's behalf, seeking pledges to vote favorably in case Premier Daladier should decide to bring the matter to a vote. Herriot has been telling the deputies that it is necessary to act quickly, as the government would like to have the payment coincide with the departure of the new French ambassador to Washington.

Premier Daladier

THE new administration refuses to allow the United States to be bound by any action that is taken, but agrees to join the League of Nations members in a discussion of what the world should do about Japanese military inroads in northern China.

Hugh R. Wilson, minister to Switzerland, has been named to sit at the council table with the league's special advisory committee on the undeclared war in the Far East, with two important reservations: The United States, a nonmember of the league, will not vote. It will not agree in advance to bow to the committee's decision, which may call for an economic boycott or other coercive measures.

EVENTS OF THE WEEK THROUGHOUT THE STATE TOLD IN BRIEF FORM

Sheldon.—Gus O. Kratt was elected president of the local commercial club when they held an election of officers at a meeting recently.

Park River.—Park River will hold a special wool grading and marketing school on March 31, in the assembly hall at the agricultural and training school.

Devils Lake.—Nick Walt, a former resident of this city, and Ernest Douglas of Beach, were arrested at Sioux City, Iowa, alleged having committed several burglaries.

Spiritwood.—Some 30 friends and relatives helped celebrate the 75th birthday anniversary of Mrs. Davis and Thomas Kane, twin brother and sister.

Valley City.—P. A. Prendergast is the new manager at the Montgomery Ward company in Valley City. Mr. Prendergast came here from Iowa, where he was manager of a store.

Jamestown.—Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Peterson's seven-year-old son, Douglas, drowned in the Pipestem river when he fell from a foot bridge across the stream.

Mayville.—Mayville's fire department will purchase a second-hand truck and mount present equipment on it in the newly inaugurated plan to motorize the department.

Belfield.—An unidentified man was found dead on the railroad track at Belfield, where he apparently had fallen from a passenger or freight train which had passed over his body.

Devils Lake.—Einar Grinstad, 20-year-old Fargo skier, injured in a tournament here, is showing some improvement, according to his attending physician.

Langdon.—The Women's club's fourth annual Young Musicians' Day held at the high school auditorium was filled to capacity with enthusiasts who wished to see and hear the youthful artists.

Williston.—Leaving Williston more than a year ago, floating down the Missouri in a houseboat, called "The Spirit of Williston," B. F. Keith recently docked his craft on Lake of the Ozarks, in Missouri.

Aneta.—Eight Buff Orpington chicks, hatched by an old mother hen on February 15 on the Perry Christen farm, have thrived over the past cold month and all passed their first month's birthday.

Bottineau.—F. E. Cobb, state forester and president of the school of forestry here, is appealing to North Dakotans to determine how many evergreens in the state date back to 1905 or earlier, their location, and their history.

Jamestown.—W. J. "Pat" Flannigan, Stutsman county representative and popular Jamestown railroader, was appointed chief maintenance engineer in the state highway department by Frank Vogel, state highway commissioner.

Hankinson.—Born at the Herman Sedler farm is a pig that has a dog face and two tails. The pig is normal in color and size but its face resembles that of a Boston bulldog and has two tails, one of standard size protruding from the front of its head.

Fargo.—The Amphion Chorus, the Moorhead Ladies' Sextet, and a tableaux especially produced by Prof. A. G. Arvold, of the N. D. A. C., will be among entertainment features of the annual ninth district Rotary conference, to be held here on May 10 and 11. Approximately 500 Rotarians from other states are expected to be in attendance.

Rolla.—Another of those "missing mail" mysteries has come to light. Helen Foley of Rolla received a packet of Fototone miniature views of Miami, Fla., mailed to her by her father eight years ago. Condition of the package revealed that it had been handled considerably since being mailed eight years ago.

Fargo.—The Cass county sheriff's department put out of business and made a liquor seizure believed the largest in the history of the city. In two raids that they made they took in 4,789 gallons of alcohol and also 138 quarts of artificial whiskey. The liquor was unloaded in Fargo and had been shipped by Great Northern freight from Cleveland, Ohio, and was being confiscated on two farms near Fargo.

Walcott.—Miss Beatta Sorlie, formerly of Walcott, has returned to Los Angeles, Calif., from Nome, Alaska, where she has spent considerable time nursing. While in Alaska her calls on patients were made by the means of dogs and sleds.

Casselton.—G. Everett Churchill sailed from San Francisco, Calif., for Manila, P. I., where he is to be manager of the machinery department of the Pacific Commercial company. Upon his return from New York, Everett spent a few days with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. G. S. Churchill.

Grasshopper Area Sees Less Trouble

Only One State Reports Increase in Number of Eggs in Ground.

The prospects for damage from grasshoppers over the infested area as a whole are much less alarming than they were a year ago, according to the results of the 1932 survey of grasshopper conditions reported by the bureau of entomology of the United States Department of Agriculture. Only North Dakota shows an increase in the number of eggs in the ground over the number deposited in the fall of 1931. If the weather this spring and early summer happens to be favorable for grasshopper growth, however, more than five and one-half million acres in eight western states may need applications of poison bran to save cereal and forage crops from wholesale destruction by the hoppers.

Detailed surveys in co-operation with state entomologists of the areas where the 1932 grasshoppers laid their eggs show that a big hatch may be expected in six counties in Colorado, 10 in Idaho, 55 in Minnesota, 23 in Montana, 42 in Nebraska, 50 in North Dakota, 48 in South Dakota, and four in Wyoming. The number of acres in these states that may need poisoning ranges from 30,000, with an estimated cost of $3,750 for material, in Colorado, to 3,084,736, with an estimated cost of $385,450 for material, in North Dakota.

Grasshoppers gained a firm foothold in the hay and grain fields of the West in 1930 and 1931, when the hot, dry weather provided conditions ideal for the hoppers and unfavorable for the disease and parasites that serve as a natural control of this pest. The infestation expected in 1932 from the millions of eggs laid in 1931 failed to reach serious proportions over much of the area threatened because the weather early in the season was cold and damp. Where the weather favored grasshopper growth many farmers—assisted by states or counties—took advantage of the warnings broadcast by entomologists and spread the recommended poison bait over their fields in time to destroy the young hoppers.

New Wool Test Is Good Guide for Sheep Breeders

By the application of a simple method, coupled with the assistance of dry-cleaning establishments, sheep breeders may determine, from a small sample, the clean-wool yield and density of the fleeces of their sheep.

This is the judgment of Dr. John I. Hardy of the United States Department of Agriculture, fiber technologist of the bureau of animal industry, who has been seeking to develop a rapid and inexpensive test for the density of fleece and for clean wool yield.

The procedure consists in shearing, with clippers, a swath of wool 1 inch wide and 4 inches long from the side of the sheep, weighing the sample, dry-cleaning it by the ordinary dry-cleaning process, and weighing it again. From the difference between the two weights, the percentage of yield of clean, dry wool can be computed for the sample. This percentage, when applied to the weight of the fleece, shows approximately how much clean wool the fleece will yield. This information is of practical value in selecting breeding animals. The wool sample is taken from a measured area of skin and furnishes the basis for calculating the weight of clean, dry wool per square inch of skin surface as an expression of the density of the fleece.

When to Fertilize Grapes

Fertilizers, particularly nitrogenous fertilizers, increased the yield, stimulated wood growth, and improved the quality of the fruit in a 10-year test with grapes made by Prof. F. E. Gladwin, horticulturist in charge of the Vineyard laboratory maintained at Fredonia, N. Y., by the state experiment station. Comparisons were made of complete fertilizers and of various combinations of nitrogen, potassium and phosphorus. Wherever fertilizers were used marked benefits were observed, although nitrogen proved the most heplful of the three elements.

Farm Population Gaining

Estimates by the United States bureau of agricultural economics indicate that the farm population of the country will be 32,000,000 by the end of this year. The net gain in farm population in 1930 and 1931, plus the gains that are believed probable last year, will more than offset the decrease of approximately 1,500,000 people in the farm population from the years 1920 to 1930. Farm population reached its peak in 1910, when the figure given by the census bureau was 32,077,000.

To Control Insect Spread

Simple changes in routine farm operations to deprive insects of food or shelter at critical periods in their life cycle offer a valuable control method, according to United States entomologists. Timely forecasts of the probable performance of many insects, based on the results of entomological studies, now make it easy to outmove these pests by advancing or delaying seeding or harrowing by thoroughly cleaning up a threatened area or by changing crop rotations

POISON
in Your bowels!

Poisons absorbed into the system from souring waste in the bowels, cause that dull, headachy, sluggish, bilious condition; coat the tongue; foul the breath; sap energy, strength and nerve-force. A little of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin will clear up trouble like that, gently, harmlessly, in a hurry. The difference it will make in your feelings over night will prove its merit to you.

Dr. Caldwell studied constipation for over forty-seven years. This long experience enabled him to make his prescription just what men, women, old people and children need to make their bowels help themselves. Its natural, mild, thorough action and its pleasant taste commend it to everyone. That's why "Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin," as it is called, is the most popular laxative drugstores sell.

SYNOPSIS

Motoring through Vermont, Philip Starr, young Boston architect, meets Blanche Manning, seventeen, with whom he is immediately enamored. It being a long distance to Burlington, Starr's destination, Blanche suggests, the village of Hamstead not boasting a hotel, that he become, for the night, a guest of her cousin, Mary Manning. Mary receives Philip with true Vermont hospitality, and he makes the acquaintance of her cousin Paul, recognized as her fiance. Starr informs her of his desire to win Blanche for his wife. She tells him of an old family superstition concerning the "Blanches" of the Manning family. Paul Manning is inclined to be dissipated. Mary's reproaches for his "conviviality" are badly received by Paul. Gale Hamlin, long a suitor for Mary's hand, visits Hamstead but makes no progress in his lovemaking. Philip, from records of the Manning family, learns the sorrowful story of the "Countess Blanche," French wife of a Revolutionary hero, Moses Manning, and of the peculiar "curse" she has transmitted to her descendants and the women of Hamstead. The evening of Philip's marriage to Blanche, Paul, under the influence of liquor, bitterly affronts Mary, and tells her their engagement is ended. Mary, at first acutely conscious of her position as a "jilted" woman, is greatly comforted by her lifelong friend, Sylvia Gray.

Silently Mary brought the little white china cup painted with bluebirds to the child. He drained it at a gulp.

"More," he announced cheerfully, handing it back to her.

Mary filled the mug a second time, and as she did so, she could see the rest of the family, in the new automobile, starting for the performance of "The Merchant of Venice" at the annual Chautauqua entertainment at Wallacetown. She knew the play almost by heart, loved every word of it, had never seen it given, and even the little mediocre traveling company that was to play it, could, with her own knowledge of it, have given her a glimpse into fairyland if she could have heard it. And none of the others cared for Shakespeare, or were in the least familiar with him. They were simply going because it was "part of this year's program," because everyone else was going, because Paul welcomed any excuse to drive the car and Violet any excuse to be seen in it, and Jane and Seth any excuse to go to a play which could not, of course, be wicked, since it was "classic." No one had even suggested staying home with the children so that she could go.

"Can't I have a piece of candy?" was Algy's next question, as she reached the crib which stood by her bed. "I ben a good boy all day, haven't I, Mary?"

"Yes, dear, pretty good. Where is your bag of lemon drops?"

"In my top bureau drawer. Bring it here, so's I can choose."

The bag was brought and a fragment carefully selected.

"I wish you'd stay with me for a while, Mary. I got a sorter pain in my leg."

"A sharp pain, or an ache?"

"No-o, just a regular pain. I think maybe it would feel better if you rubbed it for a while."

Mary uncovered the plump, brown legs and rubbed them briskly. "I've got to go now and hear Moses' prayers," she said at last, thinking that signs of drowsiness were finally beginning to be evident.

But Moses was not feeling devotional. He was constitutionally irreligious, and now that he attended kindergarten, the morning exercises at school seemed to him more than sufficient for his spiritual needs.

"I ain't a-goin' to say the Lord's prayer tonight," he announced with decision. "I said it this mornin' at school."

"Very well, say 'Now I lay me.'"

"Now I lay me," began Moses without much fervor, "down to sleep . . ." when a loud crash and a wail of distress from the next room.

"Oh, Mary, I've dropped my bluebird cup! It's bro-oken . . ."

Mary rushed to Algy's side and gathered him, dripping wet, into her arms. On the floor, in a pool of water, lay the beloved mug broken into fragments, while the crib, as well as Algy himself, was deluged by its contents.

"Don't cry, darling! It's a shame, but Mary will buy you another just like it, only prettier, maybe, the next time she goes to Wallacetown. Hush, honey. Let Mary put you in bed with Moses while she gets you dry pajamas and changes your sheets and wipes up all the pieces so you won't cut your dear little feet."

Comfort, fresh linen and more water all having been provided, Moses was urged to continue his devotions.

"I don't see why I should say, 'If I should die before I wake.' I've said it and said it, and I ain't never died at all."

"Well, say just 'God bless' tonight, then."

"God bless Daddy and Mary and Algy," mumbled Moses glibly, "and all my dear friends, and make me a good boy, and bless Cousin Jane and Cousin Violet and Blanche. You needn't bother about Paul, he snitched my woodchuck trap. Amen. . . . Now sing me 'The Sugar Plum Tree,'" he commanded, climbing into bed and settling himself on his pillow.

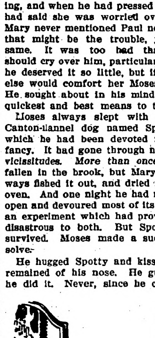
Mary began it bravely enough. But the reference to Paul was too much for her. Before she reached the Chocolate Cat she found she could not go on.

"I'm afraid I can't finish 'The Sugar Plum Tree' tonight, darling," she said abruptly, bending over to kiss him; and in spite of her, some hot tears fell down on his face. Then she fled from the room.

Moses lay for a long time wide-eyed and pondering. He loved Mary as he loved no one else in the world, and Mary, plainly, was very unhappy. He tried to think of recent misdeeds that he himself had committed, but his slate was fairly clean. Then he remembered that once before, early in the summer, he had caught her crying, and when he had pressed her, she had said she was worried over Paul. Mary never mentioned Paul now—still that might be the trouble, just the same. It was too bad that Mary should cry over him, particularly when he deserved it so little, but if no one else would comfort her Moses would. He sought about in his mind for the quickest and best means to this end.

Moses always slept with a small Canton-flannel dog named Spotty, to which he had been devoted from infancy. It had gone through numerous vicissitudes. More than once it had fallen in the brook, but Mary had always fished it out, and dried it in the oven. And one night he had ripped it open and devoured most of its lining—an experiment which had proved very disastrous to both. But Spotty still survived. Moses made a sudden resolve.

He hugged Spotty and kissed what remained of his nose. He gulped as he did it. Never, since he could remember, had he gone to sleep without first laying his head on the cherished toy. Then he picked it up and pattered into Mary's room.



"But He's White Clean Through, for All That, Believe Me!"

It was as he had expected. Mary was lying on her bed, weeping. Moses held out his hand.

"Don't cry any more, please, Mary," he said softly. "I've brought Spotty to sleep with you."

It was then that Mary realized that she had found a second source of comfort in Moses. Most of her unhappiness had been caused by selfishness. Moses was willing to make, for her, what was to him a tremendous sacrifice. She drew the child, with his little, Canton-flannel dog still in his hand, into bed with her and cried without restraint, holding him in her arms. Moses lay solemn and silent, asking no questions, making no overtures. But she could feel his sympathy in every curve of his warm little body. Gradually she relaxed, a sense of peace, of compensation, of contentment, stole over her. She fell asleep, her cheek against her little brother's.

Things never seemed half so hard again.

CHAPTER VIII

Meanwhile, Paul, instead of rejoicing in his longed-for liberty, was finding it utterly "dull, flat, stale and unprofitable."

In the first place, living at close quarters with his mother's "nerves," unrelieved by Blanche's sunny presence or the ready escape to Mary's house which had always been open to him, was not a pleasant experience, as has already been hinted. But this was by no means all. For a day or two after his sister's wedding he was really ill. As soon as he was sufficiently recovered, however, he made his way, feeling very blithe and unshackled, to call on Rosalie.

"I'm right in the midst of packing," she announced, "I haven't much time to spare. I'm going back to New York on the midnight."

Paul strove to express his regret.

"Don't you go getting fresh with me!" said Miss King, crisply. "I'm not that kind and you needn't forget it, little one. . . . Why didn't you tell me you was engaged to that good-looking cousin of yours? My, but she's a looker!"

"I'm not engaged to her," said Paul shortly.

"Oh, she's thrown you over, has she?" jeered Rosalie. "Well, I should think she would. She can do a lot better than you, Little Boy Blue, even if you behaved yourself instead of hitting it up all summer like you've been doing. That Mr. Hamlin from Boston is sweet on her all right, and he's some swell, believe me!"

"It was me that broke the engagement," said Paul, stiffly and ungrammatically.

Rosalie stared at him speechlessly for a moment. But only for a moment.

"So that's the kind of a bird you are, is it?" she inquired with immeasurable scorn. "Well, I've heard a lot about 'ancestors' since I struck this burg, and I don't deny that you've got something to be proud of along that line. The men that came up here—to say nothing of the women that came with 'em—and just got settled when the Revolutionary war broke out, and were willing and glad to strike out again and fight for their country, were sure all wool and a yard wide and then some. But I guess if they could look up or down now, as the case may be, and see their descendants wearing out the seats of their trousers sitting on the post office steps and saying what they'd do if they was President, or standing on the curbstone in Wallacetown thinking they're having the h—l of a time because they've got a couple too many drinks inside of them and are talking to some skirt they wouldn't introduce to their mother—I guess them old captains and judges and governors would think the good old stock had run down to a pretty poor line of goods! I got a fellah in New York—floor walker on the eighth—who doesn't know who his father was, let alone any great-grands! But he's white clean through for all that, believe me! If he could have your chance, my! what he'd have done with it! A good home and money for an education and a lady for a sweetheart! And you've turned up your ugly nose at all of them—while he's had to climb out of the gutter on his way to decency without a soul to help him. But he's got there, all right. I've written Steve that if he still wants a girl who's been fool enough to play round all summer with a stupid rube that was another girl's beau, he can have her, and he's telegraphed back prepaid that he'd be waiting in the Grand Central right by the gate on Thursday."

Rosalie having departed without further delay to smooth things out with Steve, that episode seemed to be closed, and Paul felt that he had reason to hope that it would be a long time before anyone made him so thoroughly uncomfortable again. But he was mistaken. The next person to treat him harshly was Doctor Noble. Meeting the boy one day on the road, down which Paul was wandering somewhat aimlessly, David brought his motor to a stop and hailed him.

"Just the person I've been hoping to see," he remarked pleasantly. "I wanted to speak to you about your fiancee. I'm worried about her. I don't think she's looking at all well."

"If you mean my cousin, Mary Manning," said Paul with forced dignity, "she isn't my fiancee."

"Oh," said David still pleasantly. "Well—of course that must be a great disappointment to you, but perhaps it's all for the best. Of course your tastes wouldn't be particularly congenial. Mary has such a fine mind. . . . Well, I must pass along the good news to Thomas Gray the next time I see him, if he hasn't heard it already. I believe he thought, with considerable regret, that you had the right of way in that quarter."

Paul glared. People seemed bent on reminding him that Mary was not, after all, in the least dependent upon him for masculine attentions. It hurt his pride.

"The war news isn't very good, is it?" went on David with an abrupt change of subject. "Ever thought of enlisting in the Foreign legion?"

"Lord, no!" Paul exclaimed. "Why should I?"

"Why, you're exactly the sort of chap for it! No ties of any kind, independent income, fine constitution—"

"Farmers can't be spared," quoted Paul hurriedly, recalling statistics he had happened to read in some newspaper. "It takes five men in the field to keep one at the front. And I've got heart trouble," he went on, growing very red and writhing more and more at David's pleasant voice.

"Hard luck! But are you sure? Been examined lately? Well, come up to the house some evening and let me look you over. Some evening soon. I'm going across myself, very shortly, as a member of one of the Harvard medical units. We'll be connected with the British army. Jacqueline's going to take up some branch of Red Cross work—nursing, probably. It isn't as if—we had any children," ended David a little wistfully. "I'm sure Austin Gray would have done something long ago if it hadn't been for Sylvia. Naturally any man that's fortunate enough to get a family like that makes it his first consideration as long as he can. Well, good-by."

Paul began to feel very sorry for himself. Public opinion, which he had at first thought to be wholly on his side, seemed to be gradually, but none the less surely, swinging the other way. If the older women still chattered against Mary, the younger ones spoke differently, and none of them would have anything to do with him. He led an unappreciated existence, after twenty-one petted years. As for the men, he thought they were actually beginning to go out of their way to be disagreeable to him and pleasant to Mary. He found himself virtually ostracized in Hamstead, and neither White Water nor Wallacetown, though he tried them both, seemed to furnish either lasting stimulation or lasting solace. He discovered, as many another man has discovered with resentment, the deadly dullness with which dissipation is permeated.

MODERN LIFE TOO MUCH FOR "BIDDY"

Tires of Existence as Mere Egg-Laying Machine.

Intimations are not lacking that nature is weary of the incessant efforts of science to introduce the element of supersalesmanship into her processes, forcing her to multiply her old, leisurely productivity a hundred and a thousandfold. She has been pushed too far. It is now 25 or 30 years since egg-laying contests in New England began to attract general attention. Poultry breeders from across the sea brought their flocks here to compete with our native strains. Amazing records were established, the result of scientific feeding, of splitting up large flocks into small colonies. Unless memory is at fault Mrs. Ignace Paderewski paid $2,000 for a champion layer. Settings of eggs of certain prolific breeds fetched fancy prices.

Up to that point the egg-laying faculty of the hen had been stimulated along the line of her hereditary instincts—proper food, favorable surroundings. But now, science stepped in. More and more the mother hen was bereft of her clutch so that it might be hatched in an incubator and the progeny be reared in a brooder. The hen was reduced to the condition of a mere egg-laying machine. All her maternal solicitude was denied an outlet. Not only that: the science-crazed poultrymen, in their eagerness to get the very last egg from their layers, began to try to fool the birds by flooding their houses with artificial light an hour before dawn in the morning and for an hour after dusk at night. By thus lengthening their apparent day it was hoped to get the birds to work unnaturally overtime—lay seven eggs a week apiece where four were laid before.

But in spite of all the dreams of science, it was not long before there were signs that the limits of a hen's laying capacity had been reached. The hen began to ask herself what she got out of it. Life, which to her ancestors had been one of infinite variety, was for her nothing but one confounded egg after another, and every egg snatched away just as she felt the fever of incubation coming upon her. Lovers of nature are not surprised, therefore, to read the admissions of a Massachusetts authority on poultry that "the intensive life of the modern hen is terribly increasing the mortality in model poultry plants; the birds are worn out before their time." A hen which under the conditions prevailing formerly would have gone on laying well for several years is now done for at the end of her first season—good only for the pot, and with little meat on her bones at that, so wasted is she from her labors. Perhaps this lesson of the futility of forcing the hen beyond her powers may not be lost upon those who are leaving nature out of the account in some other fields of activity, human and otherwise.—Exchange.

Quick Action

MOST folks, when they decide to have a piece of printing done want it at once. We are well equipped to give prompt service on your work. Furthermore, it will not look like a hurry up job, since our ability to handle rush work enables us to give it the same careful attention that is given less hurried work.

That's Us

Just a Warning

A clergyman was waiting to perform the marriage service, but the bride and bridegroom were late. At last they arrived, and the service was hurried through. At its close the clergyman turned to the happy pair and said reproachfully: "You were late—very late. Please remember next time to be more punctual!"—Edinburgh Scotsman.

Left Fire for Parade

All good New Yorkers love a fire—but they love a parade better. This was demonstrated when police, called to hold in check a dense crowd gathered to view a small basement fire suddenly had their problem solved by a band and 120 brilliantly uniformed Cossacks, who crossed Fifth avenue a block away. The crowd, with a single impulse, deserted the firemen to follow the parade.

Bank Meeting Held

All the stockholders of the Marshall County State bank met at a special meeting here Sunday with a special examiner from the state banking department who drew up a new set-up of the assets of the bank and outlined plans for reorganizing.

According to reports received just before we went to press indicated that it will only be a matter of a few days before the bank will run as usual.

Had Operation

Lowell Sovde, son of Mr. and Mrs. O. E. Sovde was taken suddenly ill with appendicitis late last Thursday evening and was at once rushed to the St. Lukes hospital in Thief River Falls where he underwent an operation the same night.

He is now feeling fine and expects to be home in a few days.

Mr. and Mrs. F.K. Fredrickson and daughter Greta and Mrs. H. O. Hanson spent yesterday at Thief River having dental work done.

Mrs. H. O. Hanson and little Dorothy and Mrs. G. Sanoden called on Mrs. A. C. Burtness on Wednesday afternoon the occasion being her birthday.

The state highway department has posted 3 ton load limit signs on the highway here this week. All concerns using heavy trucks replaced them with lighter ones.

Legislature Spends Money

The 1933 session of the Minnesota legislature has cost $5,236 for each legislative day so far. Since the session opened January 3 and including March 25, the legislature has spent $311,504.

Now, members of the legislature, what have you done for the quarter of a million you have cost the people of Minnesota? What real constructive measures have you passed the past three months you spent in session?

Boy's Common Sense

Where experts failed, the small son of a farmer living near Saranac Lake succeeded. An electric pump attached to a well ceased functioning. An expert from Plattsburg was unable to locate the trouble. Then an expert from the pump factory investigated with similar results. The boy suggested that his father look in the well He did. The well was dry.

Our prices on printing are not always the lowest . . . but our work is always the best

HOME RAMBLES

Warning. Parents should not let their children play on top of the box cars in the local railroad yards. Only a few small snow drifts remain to remind us of last winter. A few of the boys were heard singing in the rain on Wednesday. Art Thompson claims that business is good as he just had a big turnover. "Doc" is worried stiff because his Mayflower has wilted.

Car salesmen and crows are daily visitors in the vicinity. If you had money enough to pay your personal property tax, then be kind enough to tell us where you got it. Only five days more remain of the season for taking muskrats. Roll your nickels now boys as you can't take them with you to heaven. The beer will be on tap a week from today. We hope some fellows get tight enuff to loosen up.

What do you think of the present legislatue? If we gave our free thoughts, we'd be hung.

Gas Tax Collections Rise

Net collections of Minnesota's gasoline tax in February totalled $514,313 after refunds, compared with $457,241 in February, 1932, according to a report of the state oil inspection division. This is an increase of $57,072.

The total amount of gasoline, kerosene and furnace oil shipped into the state in February was 33,062,793 gallons, compared with 30,487,092 gallons in the same month last year.

January's in-shipments and gas tax collections were much lower than in January, 1932. The net taxes collected in January this year totalled about $60,000 less than the year previous.

Geo. Fricker and A. L. Carlson from here and Arvid Carlson of Middle River spent Wednesday in St. Paul where they talked business with the state banking department about when they can resume operation of the bank here.

Oratorio "Elijah" Heard By Many

Several people from here motored to Thief River Falls Sunday evening to hear the Oratorio "Elijah" which was given in the Trinity church there in the afternoon and evening that day. A hundred people from our neighbor city participated in the elaborate rendition.

The performance, which was directed by Dr. P. L. Vistaunet, represented one of the most elaborate musical undertakings in the history of this part of the country. The singers all wore special gowns and stood on an improvised platform rendering them visible to the entire audience.

Providing musical accompaniment was a 16 piece orchestra, and Mrs. Doris Halvorson Pope at the piano. Vocal soloists were Miss Ophelia Ommundson soprano, of Fargo, and Henry Houglum, baritone, of Moorhead.

We extend our congratulations to every one who had a part in the performance and, say this that it was one of the best programs of its kind that it has been our pleasure to hear.

Two Fords Meet In Dispute Over Right-of-Way

Two model A fords met in a head-on side-swiping collision on the higway a mile south of town early Tuesday evening. A coupe driven by Adolph Wagner of Middle River and occupied by two more passengers was going north. A coach driven by Jim Thompson of Thief River Falls in company with two other men were bearing south.

As far as we were able to find out at the scene of the accident from parties of both sides who stayed to guard the remains of their cars, they were all coming down the middle of the lane like a flock of congressmen and one would not yield to the other which resulted in such a horn-locking fracus on the face of the road, which was greased with a coat of wet snow, that Thompson's car had to take a seat in the ditch on the opposite side of the road he was going on and the nose of the machine pointed back over the course they had come.

The Wagner car hung on the edge of the road on its own side at a 45 degree and heading its cooling system into a hard facing wind which plastered cold wet snow in its face. After it all was over an inspection was made and a close check-up revealed no people hurt, no broken bottles, and no one to blame. Both cars lost fenders and wheels and had to be towed home.

The giant dirigible Akron the mightiest dirigible everto cruise the skies, was plummeted into the turbulent Atlantic Tuesday about 20 miles off the New Jersey shore, in a blinding electrical storm that swept the east coast. 73 lives were lost in the mishap.

Three members of the crew were rescued and up to last nite no trace of any wreckage or any bodies were found.

The navy blimp J-3 also fell in the ocean as it went to hunt for survivors of the Akron and two of its crew were killed.

Death of D. B. Bakke at Minneapolis

D. B. Bakke, one of the old pioneer settlers of Holt and the community passed away at his home in Minneapolis, Thursday, March 23, following a heart attack. He was in his 79th year. Funeral services were held at Minneapolis Saturday, March 25. His brother, Lars Bakke from Thief River was present at the rites.

Mr. Bakke was born in Hedemark, Norway, in 1854, and was married in 1878, coming three years later to this country, and settling first in Ottertail county. The young couple moved onto a homestead in Marshall county in 1883, and for many years Mr. Bakke operated an inland store at Newfolden and carried the mail to that settlement from Argyle. In the late 80s and the early 90s he served on the Marshall county board.

In 1900 the family moved to Thief River Falls where Mr. Bakke served as an officer of the Peoples State bank and later with the Citizens State bank. In 1914 they moved to Holt where he established the Holt State bank which he operated until in 1921 when he sold out and moved to Boulder, Colorado. In 1924 they moved from there to the city of Minneapolis where they since have made their home.

The surviving family includes Mrs. Bakke, four sons and five daughters, as follows: Bertil, of Minneapolis; Mrs. Effie Hoglin, Boulder, Colorado; Mrs. Minnie Docken and Mrs. Agnes Wendt, Minneapolis; Albert, Sacramento California; Mrs. Olga Spinks, Newberry, Michigan; Mrs. Dagny Halvorson, Hillsboro, N. D., William, Duluth; and Edwin in Minneapolis. A son Einar died 1889.

Other surviving relatives include his brother, Judge Lars Bakke of Thief River; two sisters in Norway and 18 grandchildren.

SCHOOL NOTES

HIGH SCHOOL

The High School boys have begun playing outdoor basketball now as the ground has dried off.

Next week we will have our Easter vacation. School will not reopen until Tues. April 18.

Grades I and II

We have to new pupils in our room. Margie and Betty Swan started this week.

In nature class we are watching the growth of beans and cotton.

Roy Johnson is still ahead in our word race. Wayne Larson now has second place.

The second grade have almost completed their work on changing the story "Rose Red and Snow White" into a play for dramatization.

Grades III, IV and V

The following children had one hundred in spelling last Friday.

Third grade — Ruby Werner, Morris Bottem, Betty Lou Lorentson.

Fourth grade — Jean Sorum, Helen Wahlin, Marvin Olson.

Fifth grade — Lyla Kolden, Vernice Tollefsrud, Myrtle Ness.

The fifth grade won the spelling race last Friday.

The fourth and fifth grades have completed their weekly reader covers.

Grades VI, VII and VIII

In the sixth grade geography test last week Robert and Opal had perfect score.

Gertrude and Eleanor had 100 in the 8th grade history check-up work Friday.

No one had a score of 100 in last week's 7th grade geo. test. Glenn, Lorraine and Bernice had the best papers.

Marshall County State Bank Reopens Doors

The Marshall County State bank here reopened on Monday on its regular charter being granted a license by the state banking department showing the local institution to be one hundred per cent solvent. They have been open all the time doing business on special accounts since the national bank holiday was declared by President Roosevelt.

The public deposited $12,000 here the first day which only goes to show that the people of Holt and community appreciate having a bank here and, that there is money to do business with if the channels for exchange are left open and unrestricted.

This is one of the biggest showings ever made in favor of cooperation. It just shows you plainly that, if, you stick with your local business institutions and cooperate all the way between yourselves you have not much to fear.

Monson-Nelson

On Friday evening at 7 o'clock Miss Gerinda Monson, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ludvig Monson became the bride of Johnnie Nelson, son of Mr. and Mrs. Knute Nelson. They were married at the Lutheran paronage, Rev. Redal read the ceremony. Their attendants were Miss Helen Monson, a sister of the bride and Johnnie Ness, cousin of the groom.

The newlyweds are both well known in this community, being born and raised here. They will make their home on the Norbeck place in Mud Lake where they will engage in farming.

The News joins their host of friends here in extending congratulation and best wishes.

Reception

Friends and relatives of Mr. and Mrs. Johnnie Nelson gave them a wedding reception in the basement of the Nazareth Lutheran church on Sunday afternoon. A program of short talks musical numbers and songs were given.

Mrs. Ludvig Monson and Mrs. Knute Nelson served a delicious lunch and ice cream.

The newlyweds were presented with many beautiful and useful gifts.

The Weather

This community was visited by a belated snow storm this week. It started snowing late Tuesday afternoon and continued thru the night and most all day Wednesday. The snow was not so heavy but mostly moisture and, from all indications we will have more suface water now then we had from the winter snow and ice.

Red Wing Wins State H. S. Basketball Championship

A small, scrappy Red Wing high school basketball team won the 1933 championship of the Minnesota state high school basketball league when it defeated a heavier Minneapolis North quint 16 to 13 at Minneapolis a little over a week ago.

It was the fourth state championship won by the Red Wing school, which has had nine teams entered in the 21 years history of the tournament.

Ada, the eighth regional representative at the state tourney by reason of the forfeiture of games by Bemidji and Thief River Falls as they had played ineligible playres, did not fare so well at the meet. In the first game of the tourney, Ada was defeated by Chisholm by a score of 34 to 12. Ada also lost to Brainerd by a score of 42 to 10 in the consolation tournament.

DON'T FORGET SALT

The following experience was related by a creamery patron: "I was without salt a few days. My cows dropped off in milk about one-half. They did not clean up their feed the way they usually do either. I then got some more salt and fed to them as I had done before. I could see a big change in my cows at once. They ate up their feed and came back in their milk flow again in about a week. No man can afford to neglect salt in the ration no matter how low the price of fat goes."

Job of Wife Neglected, Woman Writer Claims

Because in our times so little has been asked of the wife job, less and less has been rendered until now it has reached such a state that if it is to be raised again to the point where it will command respect and self-respect for the woman devoted to it, she must take a hand to herself.

First, let her discard her dilettante methods and acquire what the world outside exacts from her farther ranging sister, business-like approach to her tasks and full assumption of labors enough to justify herself.

Overmeticulousness I would not advocate. That is almost as bad as undermeticulousness—to wear out the silver with polishing, to wear out oneself on white woodwork—for after all, there is much to the wife job besides the chores and more to life than manual toil.

Nevertheless if a woman does apply herself efficiently to get the chores done, she has already proceeded a long way toward re-establishing her position. For if no husband ever came home to last night's unemptied ash trays and yesterday's papers scattered over the floor and if no husband ever found a buttonless shirt or a suit that should have gone to the tailor's (unless there was good and approved cause for the negligence), it stands to reason that this disparaging talk about the place in the home would speedily abate.

Restitution may be even more cheaply won, perhaps. If no husband were ever asked to connect an electric plug or to retack a window shade, criticism would seek more impersonal subjects.—Frances D. McMullen in the North American Review.

Leadership and Civic Pride Make Community

Authors, the most foot-free of all people, are most likely to have good reasons for choosing to live where they live. Irving Bacheller, in the Golden Book Magazine, tells why he lives in a certain small town in Florida.

"This is a town apart from the world of its time. . . . The little city reminds me of the best New England communities half a century ago. In a nation afflicted by the disorders of the 'new era' here is a town of the mid-Victorian times whose interest is chiefly the great verities—art, beauty, education, right living and the love of neighbors. . . . Civic pride is here. One cannot miss the evidence of that in well-kept lawns and gardens, in handsome homes set in artistic planting, in plans for the future. . . . Good leadership can accomplish miracles, and friendship is the cement that holds a town together."

BUILD UP THE BLOOD

WHEN run-down, anæmic and in need of a blood tonic—or if you're troubled with indigestion, weak stomach, weight below normal and you feel tired-out and weak, follow the advice of Mrs. Marie Gotoski of 1806 Jefferson St., Waterloo, Iowa, who says: "I was in a general rundown and weakened state of health brought on thru a complication of ailments. I suffered from weak stomach and indigestion, my blood was thin and in an impoverished condition, and I was weak and miserable. But just a few bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery relieved me of these ills and restored my health."

Salt Rheum Formed Water Blisters on Baby

Healed by Cuticura

"My sixteen months old baby was bothered with salt rheum. It started with a rash and then formed a water blister, and the more he scratched the more it itched until the blister was broken. Then it would break out in another place. As soon as I put his night clothes on he kept up a steady whine and could not sleep. It affected his whole body and he was a sight.

"My druggist told me about Cuticura Soap and Ointment. I purchased some and after using them a month or two my baby was healed." (Signed) Mrs. Doris Hardy, 13 High St., Boscawen, N. H., August 11, 1932.

SYNOPSIS

Motoring through Vermont, Philip Starr, young Boston architect, meets Blanche Manning, seventeen, with whom he is immediately enamored. It being a long distance to Burlington, Starr's destination, Blanche suggests, the village of Hamstead not boasting a hotel, that he become, for the night, a guest of her cousin, Mary Manning. Mary receives Philip with true Vermont hospitality, and he makes the acquaintance of her cousin Paul, recognized as her fiance. Starr informs her of his desire to win Blanche for his wife. She tells him of an old family superstition concerning the "Blanches" of the Manning family. Paul Manning is inclined to be dissipated. Mary's reproaches for his "conviviality" are badly received by Paul. Gale Hamlin, long a suitor for Mary's hand, visits Hamstead but makes no progress in his lovemaking. Philip, from records of the Manning family, learns the sorrowful story of the "Countess Blanche," French wife of a Revolutionary hero, Moses Manning, and of the peculiar "curse" she has transmitted to her descendants and the women of Hamstead. The evening of Philip's marriage to Blanche, Paul, under the influence of liquor, bitterly affronts Mary, and tells her their engagement is ended. Mary, at first acutely conscious of her position as a "jilted" woman, is greatly comforted by her lifelong friend, Sylvia Gray, and the love of her two small brothers. Paul, really loving Mary, though with a selfish attachment, finds life a good deal of a blank with her out of the picture.

Driven at last to desperation by loneliness and boredom, he decided to go to Mary and ask to be reinstated in her favor. This seemed easy enough when he first thought of it, but the more he reflected, the more he saw that it might be rather difficult. He had treated Mary somewhat shabbily, he admitted. She was having a very good time without him—he was forced to admit that too—and there was really no special reason why she should ever crave his society. He started on his errand of reconciliation several times, only to turn back, feeling that his stomach was caving in uncomfortably for some reason, and that it might be better to wait a few days longer. At last having spent a Saturday evening at home when every one else under thirty in town had gone off on a picnic, returning in the highest spirits at midnight—Mary was with the Grays and laughing and singing when they dropped her at the front door—he took his courage, what there was of it, in his hands, and sought her out. He found her, late that Sunday afternoon in Indian summer, sitting in the fragrant orchard reading a book, a rather solid looking book. She was, Paul thought, looking unusually fresh and contented and attractive.

"Hullo," he said, advancing towards her firmly, though inwardly quaking.

"Hullo," said Mary quietly, without looking up.

Paul's heart gave a queer exhibition of acrobatic powers, as if it were turning somersaults all the way from his throat to his stomach, and then began to thump—to thump so vigorously that he feared it might be audible. He was pleased, and he was beyond all reasonable measure excited.

"Have a good time last night?" he inquired carelessly.

"Yes. Did you?"

Paul choked, and fumbled with his tie. He could not understand why Mary should ask such a tactless question, when she knew perfectly well—He decided to be magnanimous, and ignore it.

"What are you reading?" he asked.

"'The Life of Charles Francis Adams.'"

"Do you like it?"

"Very much. Haven't you read it?"

Another tactless question! Mary's voice expressed only polite surprise, yet she was aware that he never read things of that sort. The top of Paul's collar was rapidly sinking to the level of his collar button. Mary went on reading.

"I thought I'd come over for a little while," he murmured desperately.

Mary turned a page.

"Nice day, isn't it?"

"Lovely."

"Warm for the time of the year, too."

"And likely to grow warmer any minute," replied Mary, her eyes still on her book.

Paul could feel even the back of his neck growing red. Still he persisted.

"Blanche is back in Brookline. Mother had a letter from her last night. She's thinking of leaving me and going down to pay her a little visit."

"I should think it would be a very pleasant change for her."

Something in Mary's tone made Paul look at her more carefully. The painful flush at the back of his neck spread all over him. He could feel the cold perspiration dropping down his spine. There was no possible doubt of it—Mary was laughing!

Paul turned his back on her and strode away. Though unfamiliar with the quotation, he had, in substance, pictured Mary sitting like patience on a monument smiling down at grief. Apparently she was doing nothing of the sort. She missed him so little and was getting along so well without him, that when he went to her and tried to "make up," she felt she could afford to laugh at him! Well, he wasn't to be trifled with like that! He'd show her. Angrily he brushed away two big tears of resentment and hurt pride that were trickling down his flushed cheeks.

In the seclusion of his bedroom he brushed his rumpled hair and changed his collar, then sat down to cool off and think things over. He'd show Mary . . . He dwelt for a few minutes on this agreeable thought. But show her what? What was there to show her? And supposing he could think up something, would she consent to be shown? His recent interview with her, the mere thought of which caused him to grow hot again, did not furnish material for much hope of exhibition. Mary, after all, held all the high cards. His only chance, so to speak, was to lead through weakness up to strength. His pride, if nothing else, told him that it would be better than leaving the game unfinished, even if he lost. His common sense told him that if he did not finish it, he would have smaller hope than ever of another game with Mary. And he wanted to play with her. . . .

Having reached this conclusion, of which there was no possible doubt, neither comfortably nor rapidly, he decided to act upon it at once. He fairly rushed to the orchard. Mary was still reading.

"Look here, Mary," he burst out, "I'm—I'm—sorry I—I acted as I did the night of Blanche's wedding. In fact, I'm—I'm just as ashamed of it as I can be. I'd give anything if you'd —overlook it."

"Overlook it!" flamed Mary.

"That was the wrong word," floundered Paul. "I meant, of course, I want to ask you to—forgive me. To—to be friends with me, if you won't be anything else—"

"Anything else!"

"Oh, of course, I knew you wouldn't be anything again after—after that! But I can't seem to say what I'm trying to. You know what I mean, though. Please, Mary—" and he held out his hand.

The girl closed her book, rose, and came toward him, looking at him with that clear and direct gaze that was so hard to meet. But, though he flinched, he looked at her squarely.

"Please," he said again. "I never would have done it if I hadn't been drunk."

She drew back a little. "You speak as if that were an excuse," she said evenly.

"Why of course it's an excuse!"

"Of course it isn't. It was—disgraceful, to do what you did, but it was even more disgraceful to get into a condition that would allow you to do it."

Paul had honestly not considered the matter in this light before.

"Well, I guess it was," he said, flushing. "I'll try not to get—into such a condition again. I am sorry. Honestly, I am. Won't you shake hands with me and forgive me?"

"I wouldn't touch you with a ten-foot pole. I certainly won't forgive you. I believe you're sorry now, because you're having a horrid time. But if I forgave you and you began to have a good time again, you would forget all about being sorry and do the same thing right over again."

"I wouldn't—I swear I wouldn't."

"You're not going to have the chance. I must go in now and get supper."

"Well—won't you at least speak to me when you see me and—and so on—as long as I do behave?"

"Yes," said Mary over her shoulder. "I'll do that, if you just happen to see me. I won't if you try to like this, again."

And with this small concession, Paul was obliged to be satisfied. Or rather, he strove to be satisfied and was not. Mary was amazingly pretty, prettier than Blanche, far and away prettier than Rosalie King or any of the girls who worked in the mill at White Water. Why hadn't he noticed that before? And she had "pep"—oceans of it! How could he possibly have thought that she was tame? He had not only acted like a fool, but like a blackguard. He deserved his fate. That was the last conclusion that Paul reached and the effect that it had upon him was more sobering than anything that had happened to him in all his life. He bowed under it, hurt and cowed and a little frightened. Then he pulled himself together, still wincing, and began to try to build together again, a stone at a time, the foundation for that happiness which he had destroyed.

CHAPTER IX

Paul was wise enough to guess that his cause would be hurt rather than helped if, immediately after his encounter with Mary in the orchard, he "happened" to see her too often. But he nodded to her when he caught sight of her at a distance, and she nodded back. He did not venture on more than "Hullo," or "Good morning" when they met. But after a week or so he remarked that there had been a hard frost the night before, and that the post office was being shingled. This daring attempt at conversation having left him unscathed and even unattacked, he risked stopping a moment, the next day, to warm his chilled fingers over the stove and get a drink of water at the sink. And summoning more and more courage with each new success, he finally appeared one evening after supper and asked Mary if she would lend him something to read. He felt that the desire to improve his mind might be one which would appeal to Mary and cause him to find some slight favor in her sight. Most of all, however, he welcomed any excuse which could be construed as sufficiently reasonable to give him a few words with her.

She held the door half-open without inviting him to enter as he made his request, and the corners of her mouth twitched. He had the uncomfortable feeling that she saw through him perfectly.

"Would you like the 'Autobiography of Charles Francis Adams?'" she asked.

He looked at her miserably. "You know I couldn't make head nor tail of it," he said, in the voice of a prisoner at the bar who pleads for justice though he knows he deserves no mercy. "I'm not clever like you."

"You're thorough, when you take the trouble to be. Thoroughness helps in reading."

"All right, give it to me."

Mary vanished, leaving him on the doorstep, closing the door behind her. When she reappeared, she had an unformidable looking volume in her hand.

"This is Rex Beach's 'Heart of the Sunset,'" she said demurely. "It took me a little while to find it, but I think you may like it better. If you decide you want Charles Francis after all, come back and get it."

"Well, your cordial invitation is a bribe worth considering," retorted Paul. Then, rather frightened at his daring, he blushed scarlet. Nevertheless he looked straight at her, smiled, and lifted his cap. "Thanks very much for this," he said. "Good night."

Inevitably, a few evenings later, he brought the book back, having, to his intense surprise, thoroughly enjoyed it. Seth had gone to prayer meeting, and Mary was putting the children to bed upstairs and did not hear his knock. After hesitating a minute, he went into the living room, put the volume down on the table, and began to look at the others that were lying upon it. He chanced on a novel of Zane Grey's, glanced down the first two or three pages, and then, genuinely interested, sat down and began to read, entirely forgetting his awkward position as an unwelcome guest. When Mary entered, half an hour later, carrying a huge mending basket piled high with sewing, he started guiltily to his feet and stammered his excuses.

"That's all right," said Mary, tranquilly. "Why don't you read aloud to me while I sew?"

"Do you honestly mean that?"

"If you would honestly like to. You might poke up the fire a little before you start in."

It was not until the tall clock in the corner struck eleven that Mary spoke or stirred. Then she rose, gathering up her piles of neatly folded and mended clothes.

"You must go home," she said. "It's getting late. That's a good story, isn't it?"

"Fine! Could—could we have some more tomorrow night?"

"I've promised to go to White Water with the Taylors. There's going to be a concert."

"Well, the next night, then."

"That's Sunday. I generally go to church Sunday evenings, now. Father listens for the boys."

"The service is over early."

"Yes, but Thomas walks home with me and comes in for a little while. You can come, too, of course, if you'd enjoy it, but we couldn't read."

This did not sound especially attractive to Paul. Nevertheless, with his new-born caution, and in his gratitude for the unexpected favor he had just received, he decided not to say so.

"Well, perhaps I will. And thanks awfully for letting me stay tonight. I've had a fine time. May I take the book home with me?"

"Certainly—would you like a glass of milk and a doughnut before you go? I made fresh ones today."

"Um-m-m! Would I?"

They went into the kitchen, sat down beside the table with the red cloth on it, and talked over the story as they ate. They did not agree as to the probable outcome. A friendly argument ensued. When Paul finally got up and pushed back his chair, they were both laughing, and Mary, with a sudden gesture, snatched the book from him.

"You shan't find out which of us is right before I do!" she exclaimed. "You had better come over Monday night and read aloud some more. I promise not to look into it myself before then. Good night."

"Good night," said Paul, briefly and happily. And held out his hand.

It was not until Mary had put her hand in his that she remembered her statement of a few weeks earlier about a ten-foot pole, though Paul had by no means forgotten it. And when, growing crimson, she tried to pull her hand away, she found she could not.

"Good night," he said again, pleasantly and firmly, and gripping hard.

For a moment Mary struggled to free herself. Then she met his eyes. The first lesson in Paul's new course of education had been to learn to look Mary in the face, and, as she had said, Paul was thorough. The expression that the girl saw in her cousin's was so full of new-born humility and penitence, and yet so clearly determined to deserve, and claim, the right on which he was insisting, that she could not well see it and remain untouched. She stopped struggling and returned his pressure.

"Good night, Paul," she said softly. "I've had a good time, too," and smiled.

News of North Dakota

EVENTS OF THE WEEK THROUGHOUT THE STATE TOLD IN BRIEF FORM

Fargo.—Death claimed H. S. Paulson, father of H. D. Paulson, editor of the Fargo Forum, infirmities incident to his age, 84, being responsible.

Brookland.—Brookland, five miles southeast of Cogswell, was the victim of a fire when the Monarch elevator was destroyed.

Grand Forks.—Holding of the annual summer school at the University of North Dakota has been definitely decided by officials of the institution, according to Dean J. V. Breitwieser.

Dickinson.—The Dickinson State Teachers college had 43 graduates at the winter quarter commencement exercises, President C. L. Kjerstad announced.

Minot.—Nick Evanchinko, missing since January 18, was found when a boy herding cattle found his body on the prairie. It is believed that Evanchinko lost his way in a storm.

Linton.—Jack McCrory, 91, died here recently. McCrory was the last of Emmons county's Civil war veterans, being a resident of the territory since 1877.

Carrington.—May 1st is the date which Carrington's postoffice plans to move to its new quarters. Work on the interior of the new building is nearing completion.

Grafton.—The annual spelling contest for the rural school children of Walsh county will be at the courthouse April 21, according to Supt. A. G. Strand.

Hatton.—Boy Scout work will be directed by E. N. Hegge, president of the Commercial club. Hegge was named by a committee consisting of Ben Halvorsen, G. M. Olson, and K. E. Smedsrud.

Fessenden.—The northwest division of the North Dakota Education association will meet in Minot, April 6, 7, and 8, as announced by William W. Barr, Wells county superintendent of schools.

Hope.—This is news—when a grasshopper is found hopping around in a field in March weather. Clifford Burley was the finder of the grasshopper and it proved to be very much alive, hence the chilly weather of which it survived.

Ellendale.—Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Young were aroused by the barking of a dog when their home was on fire. When awakened the fire had made considerable headway, but was extinguished with considerable difficulty by the fire department.

Bismarck.—Judge James E. Robinson, 90, former supreme court justice in North Dakota, died in the National Soldiers home at Milwaukee, Wis. He settled in Fargo in 1882 to practice law and was a graduate of the University of Michigan in 1868.

Buffalo.—On the Harry Johnson farm, sheep killing dogs killed 227 lambs out of a flock of 340. Mr. Johnson, a sheep and cattle feeder, brought his 340 lightweight lambs from Montana to feed at the rate of 7 cents per pound.

Jamestown.—The general health of the Jamestown pre-school children was found to be satisfactory, according to Dr. Maysil Williams, Bismarck, state department of health official. There were 390 pre-school children examined.

Grand Forks.—Twenty-nine candidates have been entered as the most representative students at the University of North Dakota, and out of this group eight will be chosen for the Who's Who section of the Dacotah, school yearbook.

Hatton.—Potatoes in the amount close to 150 carloads, have been shipped from here recently. The potatoes having been stored in warehouses during the winter were regraded and prepared for markets in the east and south for seed purposes. Eighteen carloads were shipped in one day.

Bismarck.—Fire in the Liberty Memorial building which houses the governor's office and several other state departments, caused an undetermined amount of damage. The fire started in the workroom of the historical society on the top floor of the three-story limestone structure.

Fargo.—Special railway fares of a fare and a third for a round trip ticket have been announced on all railways leading to Fargo for the Ninth District Rotary conference, to be held here May 10 and 11. The rates are believed to increase the attendance by several hundred.

Fargo.—One policeman was shot and seriously injured and two robbers wounded in a gun battle which took place in the Winston-Newell company warehouse here. Receiving a "tip" of the robbery which was to take place at an appointed hour, eight officers hid there an hour earlier and waited for the robbers to come forth with their loot. Although there was considerable shooting the robbers were captured.

Lakota.—The Lakota Lions club has named a committee to act as an exchange medium in an effort to assist farmers in locating seed and feed which they wish to buy or sell.

Mandan.—The Cannon Ball Sioux Indian drum and bugle corps, which made the trip from here to Washington to march in the inaugural parade of President Roosevelt, were stranded there because of lack of funds. Making an investment of $50 in gasoline books they found these of no value at stations east of Indiana, this explains the deficit.

JESTER WELL PAID FOR MAKING MIRTH

The business of making the public laugh has reached large proportions. This modern career offers opportunity to gain substantial fortunes by those who know what the masses will consider funny. The salaries of broadcasting humorists now far exceed those of grand opera stars, and they not only receive big pay themselves, but substantial sums are paid to their collaborating writers. There is the offsetting disadvantage that a joke which could be used for months in a play is good for only one radio performance.

These modern jokesmiths are serious students of the psychology of laughter, who scientifically go about the business of tickling the risibility of their audiences. The gagman knows that incongruity is a great source of mirth. A chicken in a barnyard is seldom funny, but if it enters the dining room during a formal banquet it causes shrieks of laughter. Another source of humor is found in the feeling of superiority that people experience when they anticipate a joke before it is actually sprung. Then there is humor which consists of a narrow escape from harm or tragedy. Being run over, or falling and breaking a leg, does not make people laugh, but a close shave from which the victim emerges with his dignity ruffled is often funny. All these things the gagman knows and manipulates in making his comedy.

The old idea that merriment is trifling and unworthy of serious men has given way to the knowledge that a sense of humor may often enable a man to rise above his troubles. "Tell me what you laugh at and I'll tell you your mental age," said Professor Gaum, of Rutgers college. A sense of humor is a sense of proportion. Laughter at one's self is a test of character. The gagman does not often dare to use this reputed type of humor and turn the laugh on his audience, as Aristophanes did, but his strides have taken him far from the old slapstick comedy, so time may even carry him into this range of drollery.

WOMEN: watch your BOWELS

What should women do to keep their bowels moving freely? A doctor should know the answer. That is why pure Syrup Pepsin is so good for women. It just suits their delicate organism. It is the prescription of an old family doctor who has treated thousands of women patients, and who made a special study of bowel troubles.

It is fine for children, too. They love its taste. Let them have it every time their tongues are coated or their skin is sallow. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is made from fresh laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other harmless ingredients.

When you've a sick headache, can't eat, are bilious or sluggish; and at the times when you are most apt to be constipated, take a little of this famous prescription (all drug stores keep it ready in big bottles), and you'll know why Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is the favorite laxative of over a million women!

"NO PLACE LIKE HOME," IF IT'S THE ABODE OF TWO LIVELY SMALL BOYS

Here's One Mother Who Sees Salvation Only in the Complete Absence of Any Bump of Order.

Whenever I walk into an immaculate house I am overcome with dissatisfaction for my own. It sounds very pretty in print when someone writes about the toys on the stairs, the smudge of little fingers on the walls and blocks on the living room floor, but it is not so pleasant in fact. Our house has all the earmarks of being the abode of two small boys, which means that it looks more like a den of robbers than anything else, for David, my youngest, is a scavenger of note. He spends his spare moments combing the alley for discarded treasures, and comes home with everything from the works of a clock to the moldy medals of long ago. To carry the loot upstairs requires more energy than he can well command. In his opinion such things make living room ornaments par excellence.

The capacity of our house for accumulation of worthless objects is just too amazing. I always thought a pantry was a place where cooking utensils were kept, and where staples stood in neat labeled cans. In our case it is the receptacle of old bottles, jugs, saws, paint brushes, broken machinery, wheels, rope, nails, hammers, boards, boxes, baskets, magazines, string, shoes, guns, tape, burnt out bulbs, smoked glass saved for the next eclipse, trains, old faucets, bits of oilcloth, hoarded papers and slimy sweaters belonging to nobody. I ought to be hardened to it by now, but it is still a pain when I open the pantry door, and once in every so often I demand a clearance.

The task of clearing out corners usually falls on Brother, who cannot act unless he is driven to it by nagging. He never has outgrown his early love of junk, and would sooner lose his good right arm than throw away an old piece of lead pipe. His idea of cleaning the pantry consists of gathering up the piles of refuse and depositing them with loving care in the basement. It is so shocking that even the coal is disturbed by the sight and rolls down the bin, covering the whole with a coating of coal dust.

I seldom visit the basement. It is too upsetting to the nerves, and my digestion doesn't function for days. Besides I can't resist putting things in the furnace, which is as much as my life is worth. Bit by bit it all comes up again. Every evening I hear the males of the family clumping down stairs in search of something indispensable to their happiness and coming up again hugging a sooty horror to their hearts. Our house is exactly like an old-fashioned feather bed in this respect. If you punch it flat in one place it only bulges in another. By no means can you hope for an even appearance.

Never in all my housekeeping struggles have I ever seen the whole place clean at the same time. If the back porch gripes me, the family moves the stuff to the attic. If the attic gripes me they move it out to the garage. If the garage gripes me they hide everything in the basement. But by no means, fair or foul, can I get trash moved off the premises. When the windows are washed, it rains the next day.

One of the most remarkable things about a house is the way the curtains wear out. I am positive that half my income is spent on the replenishment of curtains. In these days of glass curtains and overdraperies it means two pairs to every window, and we have 32 windows, which means 64 pairs of curtains. There always is a window at our house that needs a new curtain, and if it isn't a new curtain, the old one must be washed. The next house I have will have nothing but port holes.

In one of my periodic spasms of cleaning up the house I had the dark bricks of the fireplace painted white. This left the dark hearth standing out like a sore thumb. With fear and trembling I had it painted white, and what a mistake that was! The floor on each side looked horrid by comparison and the less said about the rug the better. You never know how dirty your floors are until you paint your hearth white. Of course, it's not white any more. The fire and the children's feet took care of that nicely.

There are only two solutions to this problem of housekeeping. One is gobs of money and the other is a complete absence of the bump of order. Madness lies in any other direction. Men have the right idea. They just do not see disorder. They are never so happy as when every newspaper in the house is on the floor. If the cushions are crushed instead of proud and plump, it's a sign they've fulfilled their destiny. If ashes are on the floor and all the ash trays full, it's a livable atmosphere, and if their coats are draped over the back of the chair, they are all full of sentiment for home sweet home. Occasionally I look with envy upon a home which has been wiped out by fire. What fun it would be to start over from scratch with the accumulation of years safely incinerated!—Indianapolis News.

Veteran Sure There Is "Something in a Name"

"What's in a name?" asks the skeptic, and Stephen O. Slaughter, chairman of the Kansas City central executive committee of the American Legion, replies, "A heck of a lot." Mr. Slaughter, sometimes called "S. O. S." Slaughter, because of his initials, related this experience, which it will be easy to understand, is firmly fixed in his memory, recently.

The scene was a base hospital in France in the World war. Mr. Slaughter, wounded and gassed, lay on a hospital cot. His chart with his name and initials was fixed to the bed.

A hospital surgeon, a major, was inspecting the ward. Glancing at the men as he passed, his eye rested on the name, "S. O. Slaughter." He paused.

"If you use the first initial you can make that into "S. O. S. Laughter," he remarked.

Subconsciously, he reached for the wounded man's wrist to feel his pulse. His attitude suddenly became grave. He called for a nurse and Mr. Slaughter was rushed to the operating room, where he was given a blood transfusion.

"Ten minutes later and it might have been too late," the doctor observed.

"What if he hadn't seen the initials?" Mr. Slaughter mused.—Kansas City Star.

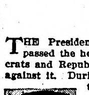
President's Farm Relief Bill Passes the House; Labor Unions Oppose Unemployment Relief Bill; Public Works Next on Program.

THE President's farm relief bill passed the house with both Democrats and Republicans voting for and against it. During the hours of oratory, confined almost exclusively to explanation on the part of members as to why they would vote for or against the bill, many interesting statements were made.



Marvin Jones

"In ordinary times I wouldn't support a measure of this kind," was the statement of Chairman Jones of the agriculture committee after a ballot had prohibited amendments. "But we are at war. And while this war is on I'm going to follow the man at the other end of the avenue who has the flag in his hand. I don't think this bill can make things any worse. God knows we all hope it will make things better."

"This is a child of the jig-saw puzzle age," said Representative Clarke of New York, the agriculture committee's ranking Republican. "But filled with horrors and hellishness as it is I'm going to follow the President."

Representative Hope (Rep., Kan.) said he could not support it. "You are putting into the hands of one man control of the lives of 30,000,000 people who live on farms," he said. "If you vote for this bill, you're simply voting for a bigger and better farm board."

In the senate the bill will not have such clear sailing as it had in the house, and it is expected it will pass only after being amended to take out of it provisions many members of both the senate and house object to. It is not safe to predict what the bill will provide for by the time it gets back to the White House for the President's signature.

CONGRESS now has before it the final two, of three, steps in the President's unemployment relief program. The first of these provides for the immediate enrollment of workers to the extent of approximately 250,000 for concentration in government established camps, the men to be employed in flood control, prevention of soil erosion, building of roads in government forest reserves, in forestry and in any other work which the President may direct.

The men congregated in these camps are to be provided with housing, food, clothing, medical attendance, and to be paid a cash wage of not more than $1 per day. In the case of men with families a portion of the cash wage is to be allotted for the support of the families.

The recruiting of this "civilian conservation force" is to be on the basis of the number of unemployed in the different states in so far as that is possible.

The expense, for the present at least, is to be met, by diverting from the treasury unexpended balances of appropriations made by previous sessions of congress for other purposes. It is said that about $40,000,000 is available through such a source, and it is expected this sum will maintain this plan for about ten weeks.

There is much opposition to this proposed law on the part of labor unions because of the low wage of $1 per day. Representative Connery, Democratic chairman of the house labor committee, refused to introduce the bill because of the labor union opposition.

The second step is an appropriation through which further grants for unemployment relief may be made to the states.

The third step, which the President will submit later, "extends to a broad public works labor creating program," including the operation of Muscle Shoals, the development of other power projects, vast reforestation plans, and a public building program involving the expenditure of $250,000,000. The cost of carrying out the "three steps" will be about two billion dollars, and it is expected the President will propose to cover half of that amount with a bond issue.

CHARLES E. MITCHELL, former chairman of the National City bank of New York, was arrested at his home charged with willfully evading payment of an income tax of $657,152 for the year 1929. He was released on bond. The warrant was based on an affidavit and complaint by Thomas E. Dewey, chief assistant United States attorney, which charged that the financier attempted to evade the tax due on an income of $2,823,405.85 in 1929.

Homer S. Cummings

The return filed by Mr. Mitchell for 1919 showed a purported loss of $48,000, which, of course, resulted in his paying no tax for that year.

In Washington, it was reported, Attorney General Homer Cummings had conferred with President Roosevelt, and that Mr. Roosevelt "fully approved of the action."

The Washington authorities have directed Mr. Medalie to present the case to the federal grand jury at once with a view to an early trial.

THE passage of the economy bill puts the question of government economies squarely up to the President. That law and the one passed by the last congress putting into the hands of the President the reorganization of government departments and bureaus, give to the President dictatorial powers over government expenditures for salaries up to the point of a 15 per cent reduction, the number of departments and bureaus and the employees needed to operate them, and the amounts to be paid to veterans, and to what veterans.

It is expected that such reductions as are made in the salaries of government departments will be effective April 1, but the savings made in the payments to veterans cannot, under the law, be effective until July 1. For the next fiscal year, beginning July 1, it is predicted the economies effected by the President will amount to a total of $508,652,000, divided as follows:

1. Elimination of nonservice connected disability allowances to World war veterans	$201,652,000
2. Reduction in pay of government employees	125,000,000
3. Reduction of Spanish-American war pensions	95,000,000
4. Establishment of uniform schedules for disability payments to veterans	40,000,000
5. Limitation on retroactive payments	25,000,000
6. Miscellaneous	22,000,000
Total	$508,652,000

The plan for the reorganization and consolidation of government departments and bureaus has not yet been announced, but there will undoubtedly be an additional saving of from $300,000,000 to half a billion dollars effected in that way.

The entire matter of economies in the administrative end of the government is now in the hands of the President.

IN RESPONSE to complaints by American Jews of the persecution and excesses committed against their co-religionists by the Hitlerites in Germany Secretary of State Cordell Hull asked the embassy in Berlin to make a complete report on the situation.

Cordell Hull

This action was taken as a result of the representations made to the State department by a delegation from the American Jewish congress, headed by Rabbi Stephen S. Wise of New York.

The department issued the following statement:

"Following the visit of Rabbi Wise the department has informed the American embassy in Berlin of the press reports of mistreatment of Jews in Germany.

"The department also informed the embassy of the deep concern these reports are causing in this country.

"The department has instructed the embassy to make, in collaboration with the consuls, a complete report on the situation."

BEER of 3.2 per cent by weight and 4 per cent by volume alcoholic content will be on sale legally in 14 states on April 7. The house of representatives refused to accept the senate amendment providing for 3.05 per cent, and the conference committee decided to accept the house percentage; the committee also killed the Borah amendment providing that the beverage could not be sold to children under sixteen years of age.

As soon as the new law becomes operative and beer is actually on sale the "drys" plan to bring a test case to be rushed through to the Supreme court for the purpose of determining the constitutionality of the law, and they believe the court will find that 3.2 beer is intoxicating and that the law is unconstitutional.

It was to minimize this possibility that the senate reduced the alcoholic content to conform with a finding of a British commission which had decided the highest alcoholic content possible in a non-intoxicating beverage would be 3.05.

Under the new law the sale of the beverage will be regulated by states, counties or municipalities as was true before the days of prohibition. There is nothing in the law to prohibit the sale in saloons in states or counties or municipalities where saloons may be wanted, and where such method of sale may be authorized.

The sale of beer has been legalized in only 14 states effective on April 7. The prohibition laws have been repealed in five other states, but the repeal in these states does not become effective until after April 7, and in one state not until July 1. The other 29 states are dry either because of legislation enacted after the adoption of the Eighteenth amendment, or were dry previous to that enactment. Some of these states will possibly repeal their dry laws before the present session of state legislatures adjourn.

Silly Old Beliefs Hard to Overcome

Even Women of Intelligence Cling to Their Fond Superstitions.

A friend of mine, a short time ago, says a woman writer of note, voiced the following complaint:

"One of the most amazing paradoxes of our day is the survival of superstitions that are on an intellectual level with the darkest ages. The joke of it is that they flourish side by side with modern civilization and enlightenment—science beside hocus pocus.

"One of the most intelligent women in our club—or so I thought until I found this out—will start nothing on a Friday. A friend whom I presented, at Christmas, with an exquisite pair of silver grape shears, insisted on giving me a penny for them—as the gift of a scissors was certain to 'cut friendship.' And she wasn't joking.

"Can you explain the survival of such barbarisms among supposedly rational, educated, cultured people?"

But I can go you one better, my friend. I can reveal a barbarism still less reasonable that is practiced in this day and age—and by those as scornful as we of those who admit to superstitions.

That is the barbarism of intolerance. For if there ever was a growth straight out of the soil of the most benighted ignorance and stupidity it is distrust and hatred of those of different races or nationalities, because they are different.

The word "barbarism," by the way, was originally used to signify all other nations. Those who used it so, unknowingly branded themselves.

And speaking of that most ancient superstition, intolerance of those whose beliefs or habits and customs are different from our own—is this not even more amazing in an enlightened person than fear of scissors or the number thirteen? In such matters the fear, irrational as it is, is yet of something supernatural, of the Unknown, while the fear and hatred of intolerance is fear of other people, people who dream and hope and work and love, people about whom in this day and age every child has learned enough to realize that we are all brothers and sisters "under the skin."

Minutes of Council Meeting

Minutes of the regular monthly meeting of the Village Council of the Village of Holt which was held on Tuesday evening, April 4, 1933.

The following members were present: Hanson, Engen, Sandberg and Fricker. The following member was absent: O. E. Sovde.

Minutes of meeting held Feb. 7 were read and approved.

A motion was made and carried that the following bills be allowed and orders drawn on the Village Treasurer for the same:

Interstate Power Co., Lights for February	2.03
" " " " " March (less meter deposit) & Int.	5.90
Marshall County State Bank, Interest on Warrants	4.51
Holt Lbr. Co., Bal. on Coal	19.75
Total	32.19

Theo. Ness appeared before the Village Council and requested proper permits to sell Non-Intoxicating Malt Liquors making application for both "On Sale" and "Off Sale" permits. Mr. Ness was advised that there appears to be no authority to sell 3.2 per cent beer without an ordinance permitting the same and it will therefore be necessary for the council to pass an ordinance permitting its sale within the village of Holt.

Moved by Engen and seconded by Fricker that the Village Council proceed to draw up a proper Ordinance permitting the Village Council to issue permits for the "On Sale" and "Off Sale" of Non-Intoxicating Malt Liquors (3.2 Beer) within the Village of Holt and that said Ordinance be prepared by the Council and read at an adjourned meeting of the Village Council which will be held on Monday evening, April 10, 1933 at 8:00 P. M. Members voting "Yes": Engen and Fricker. Members not voting: Sandberg. Motion carried.

Moved by Hanson and seconded by Fricker that the Village Council act as a Committee to draw up the above required Ordinance and the Council meet for this purpose on Friday evening, April 7, 1933. Motion carried.

There being no further business, a motion was made and carried to adjourn said meeting to Monday evening, April 10, 1933, at 8 p. m.

GEO. FRICKER, Clerk.

Relief, or Martial Law, Olson Says

A threat of martial law and wealth confiscation to provide relief was dangled over the legislature Wednesday by Gov. Floyd B. Olson, who said he hoped the present system of government "goes right down into hell" if it fails to prevent recurrence of existing conditions.

Addressing relief marchers from the capitol steps, the only Farmer-Labor governor in the nation charged state lawmakers, particularly the senate, with holding up measures to alleviate suffering.

He said he was making a "last appeal to the legislature," which must adjourn April 19, and that if it did not provide ample relief measures "I shall invoke the powers that I hold and I shall declare martial law."

The Minnesota Forest Act

Emphasizing that 5000 Minnesota men would be put to work, E. V. Willard, acting conservation commissioner, urged passage by the state legislature of the act creating 11 new state forests.

Grover Conzet, state forestry director who returned with Mr. Willard from Washington said the Minnesota relief set-up provides 15 camps of 200 men each and a number of auxiliary camps to provide mobile units.

He announced rangers already have located sites for camps in the following districts:

Grand Portage, state forest, Finland state forest, Cloquet Valley state forest, Kabetogama state forest, George Washington state forest (Sturgeon lake district), George Washington state forest (Scenic park district); Pine Island state forest, Beltrami Island state forest (Faunce district), Itasca state park area, White Earth state forest, Grattan slash area and Thief River state forest, Red Lake fire area, Savana state forest, and Camp Ripley.

Minnesota's Costs Cut

Totals of state savings by cuts in various allowances and suggested arbitrary reductions in tax levies rose Tuesday as the state senate prepared to work on additional items in the general program.

Senator Claude MacKenzie, Gaylord, announced last week that with the slashings approved and the others contemplated, the reductions would aggregate $42,000,000 in the next two years.

This was boosted to approximately $44,000,000 on Tuesday mainly because of the cut of $1,110,000 in state school aid by the senate finance committee.

A move designed to dispose of $1,600,000 of state lands within national forests, as a part of the national reforestation program, was launched in the senate.

Hope for the pari-mutual racing bill waned in the senate when proponents failed in an effort for a special order.

Auto License Fees Slashed

Governor Floyd B. Olson has signed the legislative bill slashing pleasure automobile and the farm trucks license fees an average of 42 per cent, effective at once.

Both houses acted after the conferees finally got together on a slash ranging from 20 to 50 per cent.

The new bill makes a third extension of the final date for paying the fees without penalty. The deadline now would be set on April 30.

State motorists will be saved approximately $3,317,000 and the total represents an average general cut of about 42 per cent.

Reductions are provided as follows:

New cars and cars one year old, class B, 20 per cent off the present tax.

All other class B cars, 40 per cent off the present tax.

All class A cars, 50 per cent off with new minimums of $5 and $7.50 set up for class A and class B cars, respectively.

The reductions are effective for license fee only this year and next. A new license fee scale will be set up by the 1935 legislature.

Owners of class T trucks of one ton weight will be given a 40 per cent reduction in the tax and owners of trucks weighing less than a ton, a 50 percent cut.

Gov. Olson also signed a truck regulatory bill, and one which divides the state into nine congressional districts.

State May Assume Bonds

Another vote on a constitutional amendment for a state income tax was in prospect when the Minnesota senate Tuesday passed a bill already approved by the house.

The house voted 85 to 21 to pass the act by Rep. F. A. Green of Stephen, and others, that would authorize the state to assume some $900,000 delinquent ditch bonds in Marshall county by issuing certificates of indebtedness up to $750,000, and thereby obtaining title to the land.

Safetygrams
by Fred W. Braun, The Safety Man

During 1932 fifty-three thousand people were involved in accidents where improper signals were given. Four hundred and ten people met death from the same cause.

Always signal what you intend to do—then be sure to do it. Some people wave their hands and arms aimlessly out of the car window not knowing just what they intend to do, but at the same time making improper signals for the driver in back of them.

Let's be fair to the man in the car or truck following us. He is no mind reader and cannot tell what we intend to do by the action of our car. Be sure to give the proper signal and then do as you have signalled.

Death Valley

DEATH valley is one of the most remarkable of the many physical features of California. This bed of what once was an inland sea and includes the dry bed of the Amargosa river, which probably is the largest dry river on earth, according to scientists, for some undetermined reason just naturally dried up.

This peculiar name was fastened to it by a party of pioneers during the gold rush of '49 who drove their covered wagons out into its desolate, sun-baked sands, died from thirst, starvation or exposure and never reached the other side.

A land of extremes—a mud-flat with above-freezing temperatures in winter, it registers some of the hottest temperatures in summer. The lowest point in this country—over 300 feet below sea level—it has been called "The Basement of America."

Some fifty miles long, five to ten or more miles wide, sandwiched in between the Panamint mountains on the west and the Amargosa, Black and Kingston ranges on the north and east, Death valley is located in Inyo county, California, near the Nevada boundary line.

Long ago undreamed-of treasures of borax and salt were found to exist in and enormous quantities have been wrest from this land of thirst, famine, romance and adventure, which has lost its death-like grip through the progress of civilization. Both the railroad and the highway engineer have blazed a way to it. And today, although nature's wondrous panorama continues to be astonishingly colorful, the barrenness is broken by a bungalette community which boasts unexpected comforts.

DON'T FORGET SALT

The following experience was related by a creamery patron: "I was without salt a few days. My cows dropped off in milk about one-half. They did not clean up their feed the way they usually do either. I then got some more salt and fed to them as I had done before. I could see a big change in my cows at once. They ate up their feed and came back in their milk flow again in about a week. No man can afford to neglect salt in the ration no matter how low the price of fat goes."

President Scraps Farm Board and Combines Several Bureaus Into One Agency; Wins First Round With British on Debts.

WHAT the President terms the "farm credit administration" was created by executive order which, if it meets with congressional approval, as is expected, will become operative May 27.

The "farm credit administration" replaces the federal farm board, the federal farm loan board, and the farm credit activities that have been scattered through seven different governmental agencies.

Henry Morgenthau, Jr.

The "administration" will be headed by Henry Morgenthau, Jr., with the title of governor, and an assistant, for the present at least, Paul Bestor, with the title of commissioner.

Governor Morgenthau said, after issuance of the order, that the activities of the government in granting loans to farmers and farm organizations will be fully co-ordinated. In the past, with the government making loans through the Department of Agriculture, the R. F. C., the farm board and other agencies, varying rates of interest were charged and different purposes and conditions were set up, and under the new regime, Governor Morgenthau said, unity of purpose and treatment will be observed strictly.

He also declared that all employees of the new credit administration will be placed under civil service, instead of under a patronage system as exists in many of the bureaus at present.

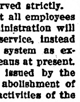
The executive order issued by the President directed the abolishment of the farm stabilization activities of the farm board which have resulted in losses of three hundred million dollars, except that he provided they should be continued only to liquidate the left over holdings of the board. This consists of thirty million bushels of wheat and twenty-eight thousand bales of cotton.

In a message to congress accompanying the order President Roosevelt said his purpose was to "maintain and strengthen a sound and permanent system of co-operative agricultural credit subject to federal supervision and operated on the basis of providing the maximum of security to present and prospective investors in bonds and debentures resting on farm mortgages or other agricultural securities—all for the purpose of meeting the credit needs of agriculture at minimum cost."

The consolidation of these various activities under one head is expected to result in an administrative saving of approximately two million dollars a year.

THE efforts of European nations to cancel or greatly reduce the war debts owed to the United States are on, and it is said President Roosevelt has won the first skirmish to the extent of considering world economic conditions before any discussion of war debts.

As a result of Mr. Roosevelt's insistence it is reported the British government has backed down from the position announced by Austen Chamberlain, chancellor of the exchequer, when he said that Britain would not swap economic concessions for revision of the debt.



Sir Ronald Lindsay

The British are now willing to discuss economic concessions before the debt question is taken up. By virtue of this sudden change of front on the part of the MacDonald ministry, the world economic conference is likely to be held in April or May instead of next summer or autumn, as the European powers were planning.

The British ambassador, Sir Ronald Lindsay, has discussed with Secretary of State Cordell Hull, the questions to come before the economic conference before the debt question is considered.

The French are also willing to discuss economic questions before considering war debts. Following a White House conference between President Roosevelt and M. Jacques Stern, vice chairman of the finance committee of the French chamber of deputies, M. Stern said that he had not discussed war debts with the President; that their conversation had been confined to the economic conference which the deputy thought "it would be very important to hold as soon as can be made possible."

Asked about the debt, he said "it would be very important for France to pay the December installment as a mark of respect to President Roosevelt. Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull have taken the position from the start that the war debts are secondary in importance to the removal of tariff, embargo, quota, exchange and other restrictions on international trade.

A preparatory commission named for the purpose of preparing an agenda for the economic conference has listed the following subjects for consideration:

"The original and present weight of debt and interest obligations.

"Price of primary commodities and price of manufactured goods, both wholesale and retail.

"The existing volume of production in different staple commodities entering in world trade.

"The willingness of creditors to make international loans and their unwillingness to receive payment in goods and services.

"The distribution in different countries of the available gold supplies of the world.

"The disharmony between the stable and fluctuating rates of exchange."

Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald, of England, will preside at the economic conference and will name the date for its convening.

PROGRESS of the farm relief bill in the senate has been slow. Senatorial dignity would not permit of the speeding up of the ponderous machinery of the upper house regardless of the plea of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace for speed and for the passage of the bill as originally written by the President and his advisors. There just had to be hearings on the bill and everybody, for and against, must have a chance to talk, and they have talked.

At this writing it seems that "a" bill will eventually pass but whether it will be the bill that passed the house, and is acceptable to the administration, or whether it will be so radically changed as to be unrecognized by its proponents, or unacceptable at the White House, is for the future to reveal.

FARM relief in other directions moved along more rapidly. The proposal for refinancing farm mortgages has taken form and the proposition is for the selling of farm mortgage bonds to the extent of from nine to ten billion dollars on which the government will guarantee the interest, but not the principal. It is expected the government's guarantee of interest will make the bonds marketable at a comparatively low interest rate.

Farm leaders have urged a government guarantee of the principal on such a bond issue, but such a guarantee would make them a direct obligation of the government, and mean simply an increase in the national debt of nine or ten billion dollars. Guaranteeing the interest only means that should there be a complete default on the part of the farmers, which is never probable, the treasury would have from three hundred to four hundred million dollars to pay annually until the bonds had matured.

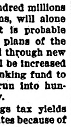
THERE is a growing belief in Washington that the budget will not be balanced during the next fiscal year beginning July 1, regardless of the economies made by cutting the pay of government employees, reorganization of bureaus and departments, and reductions in payments to veterans, amounting to an expected total of some seven hundred millions, and regardless of an added revenue from the tax on beer, estimated at about one hundred and fifty million.

The relief grant of five hundred millions provided for in a bill now before congress, and the two hundred millions for the reforestation plans, will alone off-set the economies. It is probable that the more ambitious plans of the President will be financed through new bond issues, but there will be increased interest charges and a sinking fund to provide for which will run into hundreds of millions annually.

Along with these things tax yields are falling short of estimates because of the continued prostration of business.

FIVE hundred million dollars to be provided by the federal government and distributed as unemployment relief by the states is called for in a bill introduced in the senate by Senators Wagner of New York, Costigan of Colorado, and La Follette of Wisconsin.

The bill provides that the huge sum shall be given outright to such states as shall apply for aid, and places the responsibility for seeing that the money is given wisely in the hands of a "federal relief administrator."



Senator La Follette

This official would be appointed by the President, with the consent of the senate, and carry on his duties independent of any other department.

The Reconstruction Finance corporation is given authority, under the bill, to borrow the five hundred million dollars, but will have no powers beyond turning the money over to the relief administrator. Ten days after the appointment of the relief executive, the Reconstruction Finance corporation would cease to have any control over the granting of loans to states or municipalities for relief purposes, and thus all of the government's relief financing would be under the one jurisdiction.

A NATION-WIDE boycott on all Jewish business and professional men in Germany has been clamped down by Chancellor Hitler's National Socialist party. The announcement states that it will last "until Jewish life in Germany is paralyzed." Hitler's government, while not officially countenancing the boycott, is not expected to intervene.

At Nazi headquarters it was said that the boycott "is a purely defensive measure solely directed against German Jewry as retaliation for the anti-German campaign in foreign countries."

All over Germany Jewish owned shops and department stores closed their doors and were picketed by storm troopers.

THE President's bill providing for the employment of 250,000 men for the purpose of reforestation and other work in government forest reserves and along the rivers, passed congress with some amendments made by the senate. One of these amendments removes the state quota restrictions on the sixty-eight million dollars remaining of the relief funds in the hands of the Reconstruction Finance corporation. This makes it possible for states that have borrowed up to the quota previously provided to continue to borrow until the sixty-eight million is exhausted.

In the house the bill was adopted without a roll call, but with the Republican members in opposition. This opposition was not directed at the bill but at the methods of ruling the house by the Democratic majority. It was the first of the administration bills that had not received non-partisan support. The bill was strongly opposed by President Green of the American Federation of Labor.

DIRECTOR of the Budget Lewis W. Douglas has completed the task of revising the payment to veterans under the terms of the economy bill giving the President dictatorial powers for such revision. This revision eliminates from the pension rolls all veterans with non-service disabilities, and reduces the payments to those with service disabilities by approximately 15 per cent, the same percentage of reduction as that made in the wages of government employees.

The economies that either have been, or are expected to be, effected cover the reduction of 15 per cent in the wages of all government employees made by the President; reduction in veterans' benefits and administration now made; reorganization of the departments and bureaus in the administrative branch of the government, for which the President has authority, and on which he is now working; postal service economies, now being considered. When all have been completed the following savings will have been effected:

Veterans' benefits and administration	$480,000,000
Reorganization of administrative branch of the government, including abolition of functions	250,000,000
Reduction in the pay of government employees	125,000,000
Postal service economies	75,000,000
Total	$930,000,000

Among the new expenditures that will offset these savings is the appropriation of five hundred million dollars as a gift to the states to be used for non-employment relief, and the reforestation plan of the President which congress has authorized, and which involves an expenditure of not less than two hundred million dollars.

MEXICAN Communists object to Josephus Daniels as American ambassador at Mexico City. Posters captioned "Out with Daniels" have appeared on walls in the capital. They call him "the murderer of Azueta and Uribe." These men were Mexicans who were killed in the fighting when United States forces landed at Vera Cruz in 1914. At that time Mr. Daniels was secretary of the navy.

UNDER the authority granted him by congress the President has ordered a 15 per cent cut in the pay of all federal employees, effective April 1. The order affects the employees in all departments including officers and enlisted men in the army and navy, Post Office department, and all others on the government pay rolls, a total of approximately 800,000.

The authority given by congress provided for such cut as reduced living expenses might warrant up to a total of 15 per cent. An investigation of living costs made by the Department of Labor showed a decrease from June 30 of last year to the present time of 21.7 per cent. On the strength of that report the President ordered the cut in pay to the limit of that allowed by the terms of the economy law. It is estimated the saving to the government will be approximately $125,000,000 annually.

FEDERAL regulation of new stock and bond issues is proposed by the President. He asks the passage of legislation that will require the organizers, promoters, and sellers of the issues to submit for public information a complete financial statement concerning the stocks and bonds offered.

The proposed law would provide that full information be given on every prospectus offering securities for public sale, and similar information be made available at other sources. Bonuses and commissions paid to sellers would also be revealed to the public.

No serious objection to the terms of the bill is expected in either the house or the senate.

DYNAMITE SCULPTURE

Explosives are used in making the giant figures of Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt which are being fashioned out of a mountain in South Dakota. When finished they will be the largest statues in the world.

To give some idea of the scale of the work, the shoulders, waistcoat, and left arm of Washington are planned to occupy about an acre.

Dynamite charges, carefully graduated to remove just a certain amount of rock and no more, are used to "rough out" the figures, and then the final details are put in with the aid of an air-drill, which is operated by hand.

Americans are very proud of this spectacular project, which they compare to the building of the Pyramids by the ancient Egyptians. Like the latter, they expect their work to last for all time.—London Answers.

Lady Blanche Farm

A Romance of the Commonplace

By Frances Parkinson Keyes

SYNOPSIS

Motoring through Vermont, Philip Starr, young Boston architect, meets Blanche Manning, seventeen, with whom he is immediately enamored. It being a long distance to Starr's destination, Blanche suggests, the village of Hamstead not boasting a hotel, that he become, for the night, a guest of her cousin, Mary Manning. Mary receives Philip with true Vermont hospitality, and he makes the acquaintance of her cousin Paul, recognized as her fiance. Paul is inclined to be dissipated. Gale Hamlin, long a suitor for Mary's hand, visits Hamstead but makes no progress in his lovemaking. Philip, from records of the Manning family, learns the sorrowful story of the "Countess Blanche," French wife of a Revolutionary hero, Moses Manning, and of the peculiar "curse" she has transmitted to her descendants and the women of Hamstead. The evening of Philip's marriage to Blanche, Paul, under the influence of liquor, bitterly affronts Mary, and tells her their engagement is ended. Mary, at first acutely conscious of her position as a "jilted" woman, is greatly comforted by her lifelong friend, Sylvia Gray, and the love of her two small brothers. Paul, really loving Mary, though with a selfish attachment, finds life a good deal of a blank with her out of the picture. He expresses contrition and a keen desire to re-establish himself in her esteem, but Mary, disillusioned, rejects him.

Violet, having fixed a date for her visit with Blanche, decided to go to New York for a few days' shopping first. She had no intention, she said, with a slight flutter of "nerves," when Paul, who had been giving some painful attention to the subject, pointed out to her that the state of their finances was still low after his sister's wedding and that such trips and shopping were expensive, of looking "countrified" when she first went to stay at her new son-in-law's home, and to meet her daughter's new friends.

"If you had shown any consideration of me at all, we wouldn't have been so straitened!" she sobbed.

"Why, I never urged you to spend all that money."

"Don't argue with me! You know it always prostrates me to have vulgar quarrels going on. As if this wretched affair with Mary hadn't ended every hope of our having her money! And then you try to put the blame on me and accuse me of—"

"Well, I've played Mary so many dirty, mean tricks that I suppose it's natural you should think I'd use her money to pay our silly debts. I probably would have—the way things were going. But I haven't accused you of anything. I only said—"

"Oh, I know what you said, but it makes all the difference how a thing is said, and the meaning back of the saying counts still more! I suppose you'll refuse to drive me to the midnight train, next!"

Paul did not, of course, refuse to do anything of the sort. To tell the truth, he was almost glad to see his mother go. Her indolence, her extravagance, her selfishness, seemed so appalling to him just then, that he found them increasingly difficult to live with, and none the less so because he thought he saw all these qualities reflected and magnified in his own character. It was also becoming clear to him that he must either earn more—or rather earn something—or spend less, if they were to get out of debt, and that he could put considerable time to advantage in figuring out how he was to do this. He began his reflections in this direction on his way home after taking her to the station. An unusually heavy snow storm had obliged him to drive the old family horse, instead of using the new motor, and it was two o'clock in the morning when he reached home. There was, he happened to notice, a light in Mary's room. When he had put the horse up and was going from the barn to the house, he saw that it was still burning, and heard her voice at the telephone through an open window. Seth and Jane were both away, he knew, attending a Sunday school convention. Mary was therefore alone with the two little boys, and something was certainly wrong. He went up close to the house and called.

"Mary! Mary! Is anything the matter? Can I help?"

He was more frightened than before at the agonized voice that answered him.

"Yes—YES—Oh, thank God you've come!"

He pushed open the front door and bounded up the stairs. Mary was bending over the bed. And on the bed lay Algy, gasping and writhing, and then lying deathly still.

"He's got convulsions," Mary managed to say in a stifled voice. "I can't leave him a second. He might choke to death if I did."

"What am I to do first?"

"Start the kitchen fire. We'll get him into a hot bath."

Paul vanished without another word. In an incredibly short time, he was back again.

"What next?"

"See if you can get hold of a doctor. I tried, but Central was so slow in answering I didn't dare . . . Oh—Oh—" for the livid child was choking again.

There was no resident physician at the little cottage hospital. Doctor Noble, the head surgeon, lived at home. After what seemed like endless waiting, Paul got his house.

"David's with Sylvia Gray," he said a minute later, turning with a white face from the telephone. "She's very ill."

"Try Doctor Wells, then."

There was another long wait, and then again Paul faced the despair in Mary's eyes. "He's gone there, too, it's—it's a desperate case. Shall I call him up, there?"

"Yes—no— Oh, Paul, you know what the trouble is there! It's two lives, maybe, against one!"

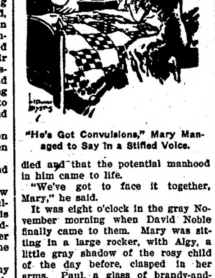
"He might at least be able to tell us what to do."

"You'll have to try White Water—Wallacetown—any place you can think of."

Again Paul tried. One doctor was sick himself. Two had gone away to attend a medical congress. A fourth, twenty miles away, appealed to as a last resort, didn't know how he could get there—"the roads aren't broken through down this way."

"We've got to face it alone," said Mary at last.

Paul knew that it was in that moment that his selfish and idle boyhood died and that the potential manhood in him came to life.



"He's Got Convulsions," Mary Managed to Say In a Stifled Voice.

"We've got to face it together, Mary," he said.

It was eight o'clock in the gray November morning when David Noble finally came to them. Mary was sitting in a large rocker, with Algy, a little gray shadow of the rosy child of the day before, clasped in her arms. Paul, a glass of brandy-and-water in his hand, rose from his knees beside his cousin's chair.

"Algy was all right when he went to bed last night," he stated, briefly. "He woke up in convulsions at midnight. I was passing about two o'clock and saw Mary's light. She was all alone with him till then. We've done the best we could."

David raised the child's eyelids to look at the pupils and felt his pulse while Paul was speaking. He bent over, listening intently to the little heart. Then he raised his head.

"You've saved his life," he said, with equal brevity.

A few minutes later, in the blessed sense of security that had come over her, Mary asked for Sylvia.

"She didn't get her twins, of course?" she asked, almost lightly. "She's talked of nothing else for months."

David's face contracted, and Mary noticed for the first time that he looked strangely old and very, very tired.

"Yes," he said huskily. "She did. Twin girls, just what she wanted. And—she's taken one of them back to Heaven with her."

CHAPTER X

The tragedy of Sylvia Gray's death shook Hamstead to its very foundations. Austin was almost crazed with grief. Even David, who had always had more influence over him than anyone else except Sylvia herself, could not move him.

"This won't bring her back, Austin, you know," he said, at last, as gently as ever, but more firmly. "And—and she would have been the last to—to want you to take it like this. Her courage never faltered through anything."

Austin neither answered nor moved.

"We must think what to do for the other baby. You've got her, you know, and the two little boys."

"I don't want to think of the baby."

"It isn't the baby's fault," said David, still more gently, divining what was passing in Austin's mind.

"No—but it's mine! She wasn't strong enough for this! You said yourself, when the second boy came so soon after the first, that—that she shouldn't have another for a long time."

"Yes." David chose his words carefully. "But, Austin—you came first, with Sylvia, just as she did with you. She was so brave that it was hard to get her to admit, ever, that she felt ill—that everything wasn't all right. But once she said to me, 'David, if anything should go wrong, be sure to tell Austin, afterwards, that there wasn't one minute in our life together that I would have had different—that there's no price too great to pay for perfect happiness.' She meant it. How many men's wives do you think can say that?—Mine can't," he ended, his voice breaking.

Next to Austin himself, there was no one, perhaps, in the whole village, to whom the loss of Sylvia came as such a horrible shock as to Mary. Algy was still very ill. The fear that the child would yet die, in spite of her fight for his life, grew a thousand times larger now that Sylvia's death had brought the Valley of the Shadow so close to her.

Mary did not close her eyes, nor stir from her little brother's side for three days and nights. And all that time, beside the actuality of the stricken child that she saw there, she visualized the picture of Sylvia and one little baby—of Austin and the other. And she thought—involuntarily, but constantly—of Lady Blanche's dying curse and its reiterating fulfillment. Whom would it strike next? She thought of Blanche, seemingly so secure in her radiant happiness, and trembled until her teeth chattered. The first time that Paul saw her again after the night of the double tragedy—that long night through which they had fought for the sick child together—he felt that he would gladly have given ten years of his life if he had not thrown away his right to take her in his arms and kiss away the tears and bring a little color into her white cheeks and a smile to her drawn lips. As it was, he could only venture to lay one of his hands on the two that lay so tightly clenched in her lap, and put the other gently on her shoulder.

"Don't," was all he could think of to say, all, that is, that he dared to say, his own lips quivering. "Don't Mary," and was thankful when she did not repulse him, but clung to him, sobbing, while he stroked her soft hair.

Paul was suffering, too, suffering with the revelation of truths that he had never sensed, with the facing of problems he had never solved nor tried to solve. The way that Austin loved Sylvia—was that the way men cared for women? The way that Mary loved Algy—was that the way women cared for children? Passion that was all love, love that was all self-sacrifice—what had that to do with careless sensuality, or equally careless affection? When, for the second time, David Noble sought him out, he found that the boy had already started to find him.

"What can I do to help?" Paul asked abruptly.

"There isn't much. Your Cousin Jane is proving a tower of strength to Mary by relieving her of the burden of ordinary daily grind. We men never stop to think that meals have to be cooked and dishes washed and fires built, no matter who lives or dies, do we? Everyone is trying to help Mary now. And no one in God's world can help Austin."

"Then what were you looking for me for?"

"I wanted to tell you that I thought you did darned well the night that kid almost slipped through Mary's fingers. He would have, if you hadn't been there. And also—to give you a message from Sylvia. She seemed to have a good deal of faith in you. I had a rather long talk with her about a week before she—went—and one of the things she said to me was, 'Tell Paul Manning not to stop fighting to get Mary back, if he has to die doing it.'"

"How—how am I to go about it?"

"I should think it might be rather difficult," said David dryly. "I confess it's hard for me to see the justice of a Divine Providence that snatches Sylvia from Austin who worshiped the ground she walked on, and lets you treat Mary like—"

Something in Paul's face stopped him abruptly. "Well, I suppose Providence sees a good many things we ignorant mortals don't," he ended.

"Yes," said Paul slowly, "I guess it does. Do you remember saying to me a while ago that as long as a man had a woman like Sylvia, of course he'd make her his first consideration as long as he could? Maybe the time had come for Austin to make some thing else his first consideration. Maybe he's needed a lot more in France than he realized. Perhaps it took a—a tragedy like that to show him how much he was needed."

For a moment David stared silently at the boy. He was too surprised at such conclusions reached from such a source to give utterance to speech.

"I think you're right," he said at last. "But Austin isn't the only one, you know, who's needed in France just now."

"I know," said Paul. "I've been thinking that over, too—what you said about the Foreign legion. I'll be up tomorrow night to have you look me over."

"Good for you! About eight? I shall be off myself pretty soon, now. I waited before signing up until—after Sylvia's time, because Austin begged me to do so. Well, I'll see you tomorrow night! Meanwhile, there are probably lots of little things you can find to do for Mary, if you really want to!"

As David drove away, he found he could not get Paul and his unexpected sentiments out of his mind. "Darned if I don't believe Sylvia was right about him, as usual," he reflected. "The phase that he's been passing through has been pretty unattractive, Lord knows, but it may have been just a phase. If only he hadn't lost Mary— But if he hadn't, he never would have started to think again—he was too lazy. Well, it's all beyond me."

Warns Farmers to Test Seed Supply

Five Suggestions Offered by U. S. Department of Agriculture.

The United States Department of Agriculture gives farmers and seed dealers five suggestions for protecting themselves in the purchase of seed. With the need for economy greater this year than ever, the department offers these pointers to help farmers make sure that the seed they get will grow. The department administers the Federal Seed Act, which forbids the sale of fraudulently misbranded seed in interstate commerce.

The five protective pointers are:

1. Buy seed early enough to allow for testing at home or at the state seed laboratory before planting.
2. Insist on a statement of the germination and the date tested. The test date should be within two months of the date of purchase, because some seeds fall off in germination rapidly.
3. Where variety is important, insist on a statement as to variety by the seller, or state certification.
4. Make sure of the quality of seed, particularly that offered at abnormally low prices.
5. Save all tags, invoices, advertisements and correspondence about the seed and report anything wrong to the state seed office.

The department reports the case of a Midwestern farmer as an example of what not to do. He bought a mixture of alfalfa and clover seed from a distant seed house. The seller asserted that the seed, one-third alfalfa and two-thirds red clover, was high in germination. The farmer complained that he did not get a single alfalfa plant. Late in the summer the case was reported to the state officials. Some remaining seed was tested and found of poor quality, but it was too late for anything to be done. Testing of the seed before planting could have prevented the partial crop failure, the department says. The department urges reporting sales of misbranded seed to state authorities.

Food for Wild Fowl Is Improving, Say Reports

Eelgrass, the staple food of sea brant and an important forage plant for Canada geese and black ducks, seems to be coming back in some sections of its Atlantic coast range, where serious shortages have occurred recently, reports the bureau of biological survey, of the United States Department of Agriculture. Eelgrass has in the past regained its abundance after similar shortages.

In some parts of its range from Labrador to North Carolina, the eelgrass apparently disappeared during 1931 and 1932, and in other sections the supply dwindled seriously. Effects of this shortage on wild fowl, however, have not been so severe as was feared, the birds having turned to some extent to other sources of food. Brant populations may have been reduced by decreases in the number of young raised the last two summers, but adults wintering in most parts of the eastern seacoast this year are in "fair to good" condition.

Because of the great importance of eelgrass to wild fowl, the biological survey and the Canadian National parks branch have both made studies of the shortage, but the cause has not yet been determined. These agencies are charged with the protection of waterfowl in accordance with the migratory bird treaty between the the United States and Great Britain.

Heavy Pigs Grow Faster

The birth weight of pigs has an important bearing on the gains they make in weight for the first six months, the United States Department of Agriculture found after observing 1,429 hogs at its experiment station at Miles City, Mont., during the five-year period, beginning in 1927 and ending in 1931.

The department found that the pigs varied in weight at birth from one and a half pounds to four pounds, with most of them weighing from two and a half to three pounds.

Nebraska boys and girls have a new 4-H project called "Fix It," which includes not only repair work about the farm, but making game boards and recreation equipment.

'Rush' Has Doomed Travel by Water

Lovers of leisurely travel cannot read without a sigh of the evil days upon which the steamboat has fallen, the steamboat whose traffic was for so long indispensable to the prosperity of the country's inland waterways. It is only a little while since a newspaper paragraph recorded the financial distress of the Hudson River night line, and now we read that the day line, which has made the loveliness of the Hudson and of the Rip Van Winkle country familiar to generations of tourists, is in the same plight—sunk in debt. That, too, is the story of the famous Lake Champlain line which for 106 years has been carrying passengers and freight between Ticonderoga and Burlington. The automobile has left these once profitable enterprises with only the bare bones of traffic. Our age demands the service of speed, and the steamboat which 60 years ago, surpassed our grandsires' childhood dreams of all that was imaginable in rapid and luxurious travel, is now looked upon as a conveyance fit only for old fogies and slowpokes.

Yet nothing in the rocket-flight of the automobile can make up to some of us for the comparatively deliberate journeying by steamboat, for the slow unfolding of the landscape from her deck as she moves with hardly perceptible sound or motion, calmly, restfully, from one landing-place to another. It is a rare automobile trip that can afford us those vistas and reaches that open to us as we thread the Highlands of the Hudson in a steamboat for instance.

The Sound lines of steamers between Boston and New York survive and there are indications that they prosper, a reminder of the spacious days long ago when every evening a proud procession of rival Sound boats curved round the Battery in New York, Boston bound, gay with bunting from stem to stern, filling the hearts of children on East river ferryboats with inexpressible longing just once to make that splendid voyage to the mysterious East, the scene of Bunker Hill and the home of Paul Revere. One of these days, we hope, the steamboat will come back into its own and plow our lakes and rivers and bays and sounds with all the dividend-earning glory of the enchanted past.—Boston Transcript.

An Ordinance Regulating the Sale of Non-Intoxicating Malt Liquors

The Village Council of the Village of Holt do ordain:

Section 1. "Non-intoxicating malt liquors"—Any malt beverage containing more than one-half of one per centum of alcohol by volume and not more than three and two-tenths per centum of alcohol by weight.

Section 2. No person shall by gift or otherwise deliver or dispose of any non-intoxicating malt liquors within the Village of Holt, except when licensed as herein provided.

Section 3. The fee for an "Off Sale" license to sell non-intoxicating malt liquors in original packages for consumption off the premises only, shall be Five Dollars.

Section 4. The fee for an "On Sale" license to sell non-intoxicating malt liquors for consumption on the licensed premises shall b fixed from time to time by resolution by the Village Council.

Section 5. All licenses shall terminate on December 31st following the granting thereof.

Section 6. "Hotel"—A place where the major established business is that of furnishing sleeping accomodations to the public.

Section 7. "Restaurant"—A place where the major established business is that of furnishing meals or lunches to the public.

Section 8. "Club"—An organization for social or business purposes, intellectual improvement or promotion of sports.

Section 9. a. On Sale licenses may be granted only to a person holding an Off Sale license, and for one room grade floors of Hotels, Restaurants, Drug Stores or Clubs, established and operated for at least six months, fronting on streets with windows permitting clear view from the outside, excepting that a Hotel may sell to registered guests in their rooms, and a Club may sell to members and guests in its Club rooms. Non-intoxicating malt liquors shall be served to guests only when seated at tables or lunch counters. There shall be no screens, partitions, curtains or other obstructions to the view of any part of such place from the general observation of persons in the place.

b. No sales shall be made to a person under the influence of intoxication, and such person shall not be permitted in the place. No pool tables, billiard tables, card tables, gambling devices or games of chance shall be permitted on the premises. A license shall not be granted to any place in which a manufacturer of non-intoxicating liquor has any interest, or to a person who has been convicted of a felony, or for the violation of any provision of this ordinance.

c. No proprietor or employee of any licensed place shall be permitted to sit at any table, counter or booth and drink with a customer, nor shall any person or persons be permitted to use any alcohol to spike any malt or non-intoxicating malt liquors or mix any other drinks containing alcohol within the premises of any licensee nor upon the public streets of the Village of Holt and no liquor shall be consumed there.

Section 10. Licensed premises shall be open at all times to inspection by police, health or other officers or employees of the Village.

Section 11. Applications for a license shall be made upon forms to be supplied by the Village, showing: The name of the applicant, his age, citizenship, good moral character and repute, residence for the past three years, a complete description of the premises from which sale is applied for, the business carried on at said place for the last six months, whether the applicant is the owner or lessee, and the length of time the applicant has occupied the premises; and accompanied with a receipt from the Village Treasurer for the required license fee.

The Village Council shall have exclusive right to deny any application; and may limit the number of licenses to be granted. In the event the license is denied, the Village Recorder shall issue to applicant an order for a refund of the amount paid to the Treasurer.

Section 12. No sale of non-intoxicating malt liquors shall be made between the hours of eleven o'clock P. M. and six o'clock in the forenoon, nor on a Sunday or any primary election, general election, special election, or any other election day, or on the following holidays: New Years Day, Good Friday, Memorial Day, Thanksgiving Day, and Christmas Day.

Section 13. Any license granted hereunder may be revoked by the Village Council without notice upon discovery of any false or misleading statement in the application, or for the violation of any provision of this ordinance, or any state law or federal act, and upon the conviction of the licensee in any court for the violation of any provision of this ordinance, or any state law or federal act such license shall be automatically revoked.

Section 14. Non-intoxicating malt liquors shall not be sold, given away or otherwise disposed of or consumed at or in any theatre, at a ball park, at a dance hall, or any other place of public gathering for the purpose of entertainment, amusement or playing of games or upon the public streets of the Village of Holt and no liquor shall be consumed there.

No sale of non-intoxicating malt liquors shall be made to any person under guardianship, nor to any person under twenty-one years of age.

Section 15. Any person violating any provision of this ordinance shall be guilty of a misdemeador and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding One Hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in jail for not more than ninety days.

Section 16. All parts of ordinances inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Section 17. If any section, or part of a section, of this ordinance shall for any reason be held to be invalid such invalidity shall not affect the validity of the remaining sections, or parts of sections, of this ordinance.

This ordinance shall take effect upon passage, publication, and recording thereof.

U. S. Goes Off Gold Standard

In a day of historic financial action, President Roosevelt moved boldly forward Wednesday night for controlled inflation on an international scale.

He swung the United States off the gold standard in world trade as an opening shot and Wednesday nigh sanctioned legislation giving him broad authority to carry through his program to lift American prices, stabilize the world exchanges on a revised gold basis and expand the use of currency.

The swift executed maneuvers by the confident president brot a turbulent reaction throuout the world. American stock and commodity prices shot upward. The dollar fell off in the world exchanges. Wall street quotations on foreign currency rose spectacularly.

To Sing at Crookston

St. Olaf Lutheran Choir, recognized as America's greatest a capella singing group, will present a sacred concert on the evening of April 23rd at the Crookston Armory. The choir, under the direction of F. Melius Christianson, has toured annually since 1911.

Internationally famous, the choir has appeared before many notable gatherings thruout the world. They presented a series of 35 concerts in Europe during 1913 and again crossed the Atlantic in 1930 to make forty appearances in various countries.

Northern Minnesota has not been frequently favored by the appearande of this choir, so the Crookston Armory will find itself taxed to accomodate the people who will come to enjoy the singing by this choir.

Minnesota Conservation Week

By official proclamation, Gov. Floyd B. Olson has designated the week of April 23 as 'Minnesota Conservation Week.'

Plans for an extensive educational drive, to bring home the message of conservation and the need for intelligent management of our natural resources "in the interest of all the people" have been formulated by E. V. Willard, Acting Conservation Commissioner.

"There is no more appropriate time than Conservation Week", Mr. Willard said, "to bring such a message home to the people.

"The conservation movement presents a challenge to the forces that in the past have wasted and destroyed our forests and other natural resources, the heritages of all our people.

"The principle of conservation is not at all complicated. It merely means the intelligent use and management of natural resources for the permanent good of all the people.

"Conservation of our natural resources does not necessarily imply saving or hoarding or keeping them from use. It means intelligent use. It means restoration of replaceable species, replenishment of those of which are in danger of becoming extinct, finding added uses for those of which we have an abundance and the control or extermination of those which prey upon and destroy or interfere with the developement of kinds and classes which we need and are desirable.

"To know what our natural resources really are, to appreciate the extent to which they may be made to serve our needs as well as our pleasures, to understand the difficulties and limitations which sorround the formulation and application of practical remedies and having acquired this knowledge, to apply it with wisdon in promulgating and directing policies which will make our natural heritages serve present and future needs most effectively, is conservation."

The Governor, in his proclamation, stated:

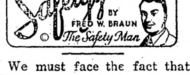
"Past extravagent use and aimless and selfish exploitation of our natural resources have brought the people of the state and nation facing the necessity of providing for future needs. Logging and fires have consumed our virgin timber supplies.

"Areas where game may find refuge are becoming more and more restricted making its existance progressively more precarious. Pollution endangers fish life. Erosion as an element of destruction of soil fertility is becoming a matter of pubiic concern. Increased intensive use of water coupled with deficient supplies is directing public attention to our waters as never before. We are faced with the serious tasks of reforestation, restoration of breeding grounds and refuges for game and saving our waters for domestic and industrial supplies and aquatic life.

"It is fitting that at this season of the year we should set aside one week when every effort may be made to impress upon our citizens the importance of saving our forests from destruction by fire and waste, protecting our song-birds and game and conserving our lakes and streams. Through such conservation we not only add to the wealth of our state but we preserve the natural esthetic attributes for which Minnesota is justly famous.

"I urge that organizations and institutions such as schools, churches and civic groups observe this week and this day with ceremonies appropriate to the occasion."

The weather the past week has been of a very mild caliber. There has been sunshine and warm winds everyday which has put the roads and fields in fine shape. Some say that it must really be spring that is here.



We must face the fact that youngsters will play in the streets—just as long as there are streets and youngsters. No matter what laws our Legislature passes or what rules and regulations the City Council, the Village Board, or the Town Committee might pass, kids will continue to run into the highway and subject themselves to the danger of being hit by an automobile.

There is a sacred responsibility on the part of all drivers to look out for all children; to expect the unexpected on their part; and to do their thinking for them.

The little folks are entirely at the mercy of the driver. Children should be seen—not hurt.

No Assessors Meet This Year

Marshall county taxpayers will be saved more than $500 as a result of a decision of the Minnesota Tax Commission not to hold an assessors school in the county this spring, according to H. M. Hanson, deputy county auditor.

The decision not to hold an assessors school was made in the interest of economy and the reduction of expenditures, said the letter from the tax commission addressed to Levi G. Johnson, County Auditor. Assessors' meeting are being dispensed with in several of the Northern counties this years.

Last year Marshall county spent $523.55 to hold the annual assessors' meeting, the assessor being paid $4.00 for the day together with the mileage fee in coming to Warren.

Letters of instruction will be mailed to all assessors in the county by the tax commission before May 1, when they will commence their work in placing values on property in the county. The letters will explain all new changes in assessment laws as adopted by the Minnesota Legislature.

As a result of recent action in St. Paul, changes are being made in one classification in the assessment books. The new rule states "All horses, mules and asses used exclusively for agricultural purposes and all agricultural tools, implements and machinery used by the owner in any agricultural pursuit shall constitute Class 3A and shall be valued and assessed at 10 per cent of the full and true value: Formerly this classification was assessed at 33⅓ per cent of the true and full value."

As the assessment books and supplies had already been printed with the old classification rates, a sticker has been prepared covering the new rate which will be placed over the old classification.—Sheaf.

State Assumes Marshall Co. Ditch Bonds

Passage of the Marshall County Ditch Tax relief bill was completed last night [Tuesday] when the Minnesota Senate voted 35 to 12 approving the measure passed just one week ago in the House of Representatives carrying with it an appropriation of $750,000 in Certificates of Indebtedness.

The Governor said he would sign the bill should the house and senate pass it.—Sheaf.

Telephone Meeting

A big telephone meeting is scheduled to be held in Holt tomorrow night, Saturday April 22, at 8 o'clock p. m., according to announcement received at this office.

We personally think that this is an opportune time for all shareholders of the old telephone companies around Holt to come together and discuss the present system and to lay plans for a new and improved method of conducting the telephone companies here.

As it is now, where can you call and say that you have received any service? There are many phones in the community, but most of them are either out of order or the owner is cut off the line for non-payment of dues. The answer you get when you try to collect is that the service is too poor to pay for and the results have been that the system has gone more or less into the mess of dying enterprises.

Let's have a big turnout tomorrow night. Shareholders, telephone patrons, and all who are interested in better telephone service are invited to come and settle the whole matter in a clean business way.

Roosevelt Plan on Farm Loans Calls for Two Billion Bond Issue—30-Hour Week Proposed for Workers—The Akron Disaster.

FOLLOWING the reading of a brief special message on the subject from the President, Senator Robinson of Arkansas introduced the administration's farm mortgage refinancing bill which, with the farm relief bill, is designed to lift the farmers out of the slough of depression.

Senator Robinson

The bill provides for issuing by the farm loan banks of bonds to the extent of $2,000,000,000, on which the government guarantees the interest payments. The bonds, or the money derived from their sale, are to be used by the farm loan banks for the purpose of taking over the farm mortgages on which the interest rates cannot be more than 4½ per cent.

The expectation is that with money available to settle with his creditor the farmer can scale down the principal of his debt to a considerable extent. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., governor of the new farm credit administration, believes mortgage indebtedness may be scaled down in two ways. A mortgagee, willing to settle for cash or bonds at 70 or 80 per cent of the principal, could exchange the mortgage on that basis for land bank bonds. The bank then would refinance the farmer at 4½ per cent. Or a farmer making a composition with his creditor could borrow the funds for settlement from the land bank.

Opposition to the legislation revolves around two arguments. One is that it will be an inducement to farmers to default in the payments on their present mortgages in order to persuade mortgagees to settle at less than face value. The other is that such a vast flotation of 4 per cent bonds would tend to demoralize the bond market and react unfavorably on banks and insurance companies with large bond portfolios. The maturity of the bonds is to be fixed by the land banks and probably will be 30 or 40 years.

Stated briefly, the main provisions of the farm finance bill are as follows:

Federal land banks are authorized to issue up to $2,000,000,000 in 4 per cent bonds, interest guaranteed by government.

The same banks could purchase first mortgages on farm land or exchange bonds for them.

The treasury is authorized to subscribe $50,000,000 to the paid-in surplus of the banks.

Interest rate on loans on mortgages shall not exceed 4½ per cent.

A total of $15,000,000 would be available from the treasury to compensate banks for interest reduction.

The limit on mortgage loans would be raised from $25,000 to $50,000.

A total of $100,000,000 of Reconstruction Finance corporation's funds is made available for loans to farmers for refinancing their debts in accordance with provisions of the new bankruptcy relief act.

Reconstruction Finance corporation is authorized to loan $50,000,000 to drainage, levee and irrigation districts to reduce and refinance their debts.

Increases the lending power of the Reconstruction Finance corporation by $300,000,000.

THE number of veterans to be affected by the President's order reducing veterans' benefits will not be known for some time. In one way or another it will be felt by practically all of the Spanish-American and World war veterans, and the widows of veterans of these wars now on the government pension rolls, because it reduces the rates on the greater part of such pensions as will continue to be paid. These reductions and those to be dropped from the pension rolls will be affected after July 1 of this year. In brief, the order makes the following provisions:

Payment of pensions authorized to veterans disabled by disease or injury incurred or aggravated in line of duty in active service.

Rates to be paid for service connected disabilities are: 10 per cent disabled, $8 a month; 25 per cent, $20; 50 per cent, $40; 75 per cent, $60; 100 per cent, $80. These are 20 per cent reductions under present aids.

Pensions authorized to widows, children, and dependent parents of veterans who died from disease or injuries incurred or aggravated in line of duty in active service. Rates continue as at present.

Payments authorized for non-service connected disabilities and deaths of veterans who served 90 days in the Spanish-American war, Boxer rebellion, Philippine insurrection, and World war, provided disability was total and not due to personal misconduct.

Latter allowance will not be made to unmarried persons with income of more than $1,000 a year or to any married person or one with minor children whose income exceeds $2,500.

Pensions of widows and children of Spanish-American war veterans cut 50 per cent.

Excludes peace-time veterans from domiciliary care.

Limits sharply emergency officers' pensions.

BOTH the senate and house are considering a bill, of which Senator Black of Alabama is the author, that would establish a thirty-hour work week. As the bill is presumed to have the endorsement of the President and the special approval of Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins, it is expected to pass both houses.

The bill would compel private industry to adopt the thirty-hour week and penalize interstate movement of products made by labor working longer hours.

Black expressed confidence the bill would be upheld by the United States Supreme court.

The Alabama senator said the bill would not accomplish its purpose if it resulted in reduction of wage levels as well as hours and expressed the belief that, if industry attempted to reduce wages, congress would act. "Labor has been underpaid and capital overpaid," he said.

Borah said he was "in thorough accord with the principle of this bill and I'm not so sure that we're not going to have to come to it." His argument revolved around whether congress had the power to take action.

THE country's great loss in the destruction of the Akron is not the loss of the navy's great dirigible, but of the 74 officers and men who went down with her in the storm off the coast of New Jersey. Rear Admiral Moffett, chief of the aeronautic bureau of the navy, who was a passenger on board, with his shipmates upheld to the end the finest traditions of the navy.

Admiral Moffett

The wreck of the Akron, largest of its kind in the world, was the worst airship disaster in history. The airship crashed off the New Jersey coast, twenty miles off Barnegat lightship, during a violent electric storm, accompanied by heavy winds and high seas, dense fog and thick rain.

Lieutenant Commander Wiley, second in command of the airship, and the two men who were saved owed their lives to the chance that brought the German oil tanker Phoebus close to the scene of the accident a few minutes after it happened. They were picked up immediately by the Phoebus, whose crew saw others disappear beneath the waves before rescuers could reach them. The Phoebus cruised about the scene until dawn, but was unable to find any more survivors or to keep track of the wreckage, which was carried swiftly away by the seas.

First report of the disaster was received in radio messages from the Phoebus. Both coast guard and naval vessels were immediately dispatched to the scene of the wreck and cruised around for hours in the hope of finding other survivors. The navy blimp J-3, taking part in the search, fell into the sea. Five of its crew were rescued.

The search was fruitless, and, in the case of the accident to the blimp J-3, was ill fated also.

DETERMINATION to end naval airship construction is mounting through a congress intent upon finding the real causes of the Akron's plunge into the Atlantic.

Fred Britten

In the senate King (Dem., Utah), prepared a resolution calling for an investigation of the Akron disaster and the consideration of the advisability of spending more than the $20,000,000 that the navy already has invested in lighter-than-air craft. Chairman Trammel of the senate naval committee also was considering a study of the accident.

Chairman Vinson of the house naval committee has declared emphatically "there won't be any more airships built."

There were some, however, not so ready to yield beliefs founded during many years in congress. Many had followed Representative Britten of Illinois, who as Republican chairman of the naval committee for years had charge of most of the recent legislation for airships, particularly that authorizing the $8,000,000 Akron-Macon sister ship team. Mr. Britten has always declined to support those who thought lighter-than-air craft should be abandoned.

Many members were undecided how far they wanted to go in their ban on airships. Vinson said he thought nothing should be done to prevent operation of the Macon, which is to take the air toward the end of the month. Nor did he think that the new dirigible base at Sunnyvile, Calif., where $4,000,000 had been expended, should be shut down.

MICHIGAN is the first state to vote in favor of the repeal of the Eighteenth amendment. Wisconsin is second with a decisive vote of 4 to 1 for repeal. Town and country alike turned out thumping wet majorities. Milwaukee, where the breweries are humming to turn out 3.2 beer, went wet by more than 10 to 1. Wisconsin's constitutional amendment convention will be held in Madison, April 25. It is predicted that practically all the delegates will be committed to repeal. In Michigan, but one county elected a dry delegate.

J. P. MORGAN & CO., New York bankers, are in for an investigation by a committee of the United States senate, and a committee backed by all the authority which that august body can give.

Without debate, the upper chamber adopted the Fletcher resolution extending wide power to the banking committee to make the inquiry into private banking which President Roosevelt has sponsored.

The resolution was drafted by Ferdinand Pecora, committee counsel, with a view to obtaining all the senate's constitutional power over interstate commerce, banking and tax matters for the committee.

Pecora told the committee he had submitted twenty-three questions to the Morgan firm and that on advice of John W. Davis, its counsel, the banking house had refused to answer one and taken several others under consideration.

DESPITE the Hitler government's dropping of the boycott against German Jewry, the National Socialist party will keep its boycott machine intact. Disappointed at being deprived of the boycott, Nazi auxiliary police raided a Jewish quarter in Berlin. Accompanied by regular police, they searched everywhere for weapons and papers. Streets were closed and pedestrians were stopped. Even worshippers leaving synagogues were halted. Persons not carrying documentary identification cards were arrested.

The Nazi boycott committee headquarters at Munich announced that "all German stores in the near future will be supplied with big placards identifying them as such." In this way the Nazis will distinguish between German and Jewish stores.

A measure forbidding kosher slaughtering throughout the nation has been approved by the reich's cabinet.

A NEW suggestion for a preliminary conference of experts to be held in the United States to prepare for the world economic conference developed at a meeting in Paris between Norman H. Davis, President Roosevelt's ambassador-at-large, and Joseph Paul-Boncour, French foreign minister. In this the French see their opportunity of talking over war debts.

Norman Davis

Like the British, the French want to wangle a debt settlement before the economic conference convenes. So fervid is this desire that Davis expressed his displeasure that Europe, with its very existence at stake, should think of nothing else.

Mr. Davis feels that the Washington administration has made it clear that there are bigger jobs to be done—removal of trade barriers, for example.

So with hopes of calling the economic conference at an early date abandoned, the idea of a preliminary meeting to agree on what is to be done and how to go about it is making headway.

When the new French ambassador to the United States, Andre Lefevre de la Boulaye, sailed for America he was accompanied by a treasury expert to prepare the ground for what Paris hopes will be a general debts discussion.

Responsible officials of the State department in Washington declared that reports from London that Mr. Davis had presented an offer to scale down Britain's debt to the United States by $092,000,000 were absolutely without foundation.

Premier Ramsay MacDonald plans to sail for the United States about April 15 for a conference with President Roosevelt regarding war debts, world economics and armament.

MOUNT EVEREST at last has been conquered. Two airplanes have flown across the summit and for the first time in history men looked down upon the highest mountain in the world. The feat was accomplished by the British expedition headed by the marquis of Clydesdale. A photographer succeeded in taking a number of pictures which, it is hoped, will provide an authentic record of the conquest of the 29,002-foot mountain, on the sides of which numerous men have perished attempting by old-fashioned methods to gain the honor of being the first to reach the top.

Although exhaustive preparations had been made for the flight over Mount Everest, the actual carrying out of the feat was in a measure accidental. When the two ships went up the purpose of the flyers was only to make a test. But they found conditions so ideal that they turned the test into the real business. The two planes flew at an altitude of approximately 6.6 miles and the flight over the peak required three and a half hours.

FASCISM is growing in Great Britain. Every manifestation of the Fascist movement in Italy and Germany can be seen in and around the house where Sir Oswald Mosley, millionaire would-be dictator, has based the British Union of Fascists. The waiting room is a small gymnasium. Physical training is compulsory. The Mosley black shirts, who are the beginnings of the British storm troops, are required to box, fence or wrestle twice weekly.

The black shirts form the nucleus of Mosley's "army." They have an auxiliary in the gray shirts, who cannot give as much time to physical training as the black shirts but who have a big place in the strong arm branch of the organization.

News of Minnesota

EVENTS of the week throughout the "State of Ten Thousand Lakes" told in brief form

Minneapolis—The City Council passed the beer bill over Mayor Anderson's veto, by a vote of 23 to 3.

Fergus Falls—A deposit of lignite coal has been found on the Bennie Grue farm. A well driller encountered a heavy layer of lignite.

Blue Earth—A 10 per cent salary reduction was voted for all local school teachers. Decision to retain the training department was made.

Minneapolis—The deputy collector of revenue and 13 assistants handled the biggest single day's crowd of income tax payers in 10 years on March 31.

New Ulm—The Brown county board of commissioners voted to borrow $17,500 from the county ditch sinking fund to pay road and bridge bonds now due.

Minneapolis—The Emergency Garden Committee has begun work on preparations to provide plots for more than 500 families in the 1933 community garden.

Deer River—Many unemployed men in Itasca county, enjoying a considerably better market than that of last year, are making a livelihood from trapping muskrats.

Minneapolis—In the play-off series between the Eveleth and Minneapolis hockey teams, the Rangers won the last three games and the Central League Championship.

Comfrey—Stanley Benson, 20 years old, living near here, walked in his sleep, went to the woodpile in back of his home, picked up an ax and chopped off his arm between the wrist and the elbow.

Duluth—The largest vote in a municipal election was cast by Duluth voters when they re-elected Mayor S. F. Snively for his fourth four year term and overwhelmingly repealed the city's liquor ordinance.

Glenwood—The Glenwood city commission has ordered a special election for April 11, when voters will be asked to approve or reject issuance of $38,000 bonds to construct a sewage disposal plant for the city.

Tracy—Lacking any definite clues, railroad officials expressed a belief that pranksters had placed two ties across the tracks near here for which a Chicago North Western train was brought to a halt. No damage was done.

Glencoe—Three Glencoe business men are ahead a total of $10.25 in conscience money, all evidently from the same debtor, L. S. Preiss received $6, Harry Marshall $4 and Henry Wadel 25 cents. The letters were anonymous.

Minneapolis—Five hundred unemployed will be enrolled immediately for federal reforestation work at $1 a day and board, as part of the first contingent of 25,000 men from 16 major cities who will be placed at work in the forests.

Bagley—Communists who attempted to have a meeting at the county courthouse here to present demands for relief got little sympathy from officials and townsfolk, and after considerable argument leaders of the group were escorted to the outskirts of town and requested to remain away.

St. Paul—Plans to observe the diamond jubilee of Minnesota's admission to the union were considered at a conference between Governor Olson, representatives of the Minnesota Historical Society, the state tourist bureau and other interested organizations. The anniversary of admission falls on May 11. Minnesota being granted statehood on that day in 1858.

Minneapolis—A local tri-motored plane, carrying the Canadian amateur champion basketball team from Tulsa, Okla., crashed near Neodesha, Kan., killing six men and seriously injuring the other 8 passengers. The dead: A. H. Hakes, pilot; H. E. Eggen, co-pilot and J. H. O'Brien, owner of the plane, all from Minneapolis; Mike Shea, R. H. Bonynger and Joe Dodds of Canada, players on the team.

Cloquet—Lumber companies are anticipating an increase in business following legalization of 3.2 per cent beer through sale of lumber to manufacture kegs and building of cases for bottles. A shipment of three carloads of lumber was sent to a Manitowic, Wis., brewer to be used in making kegs, while additional orders are expected. Northern white pine and some aspen is used. One lumber plant can manufacture 10,000 cases a day.

Winona—Pledged to defend President Roosevelt's legislative program against the attacks of organized minorities, 400 Winona residents who joined a New Deal Association laid plans to extend their movement to other parts of Minnesota.

Brainerd—The jig-saw puzzle went to church here when Rev. E. A. Valiant, Baptist pastor, used a giant puzzle depicting throngs entering a church as a sermon illustration. The puzzle is 32 feet square, contains about 100 pieces and required a crew of 10 to assemble it.

A Little Thing Like Clothes

By JESSIE DOUGLAS

©, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service

"THAT," said Tom Winship, knocking the ash from his cigarette, "is the primmest girl in this town."

They both looked after the retreating figure of Daisy Miller, dressed so neatly in her blue serge, with a black hat that was meant to cover, not adorn, the red-brown hair.

"If you give me a month I could have that girl so dead in love with me that any one could see it!" Arthur Baldwin offered.

"You've lost already, and I'll put ten on it, Art."

Daisy Miller's heart beat very fast as she washed the dinner dishes. She had really not seen anything of Arthur Baldwin since they were in high school together; she had thought less of him, and yet tonight he had telephoned her to ask permission to come over to see her.

"I don't see why he should want to see me," she thought, "I can't understand—" and yet she was flattered and she felt a new glow in the dullness of the gray days and an escape from monotony.

In her own room she surveyed her wardrobe critically. The gray challis was beyond redemption and her best crepe needed a patch under the arm; the only thing left was what she had on, the blue serge dress that had never been anything but useful.

Again she felt that strange new excitement when the bell wheezed and she opened the door to Arthur Baldwin. He stood a moment in the hall retaining her hand.

"I am glad to see you, Daisy!" he said, scrutinizing her white face.

There was an awkward silence for a moment after he had seated himself in the comfortable living room in the big chair across from Mr. Miller.

"How're you getting on with your law?" Mr. Miller inquired.

Arthur Baldwin found himself in the clutches of that inveterate old talker, and he listened to drowsy reminiscences of the '80's, while he fidgeted in his chair.

When at last he said good night he admitted it was one of the dullest evenings he had ever spent and quite unsuccessful except for his last remark to Daisy.

"You certainly have wonderful hair, Daisy," he said as he took her hand in the hall as he left.

He smirked to himself as he remembered the slow, almost painful flush that touched her cheeks.

"I'm old enough to know better," Daisy thought the next morning as she scanned the paper; but a new infection in the air had caught her and she explained to her father briefly that she was going to the city.

It must have been the hair that did it, but Daisy was unable to resist a hat that looked altogether alluring in one of the smartest shops on Fifth avenue.

But the hat made her suit look even older than ever; and Daisy plunged. She gasped when she saw herself in the new suit with its long, slim lines and its delicious golden brown color; with bewitching hat. But how shabby her shoes looked.

As a very last touch she bought herself a new pair.

"It'll take me years to save it all again," Daisy thought shame-facedly. "All the money that I put by for a rainy day!"

She settled herself down by the window in the train, feeling in her new clothes that she was too noticeable. She prayed that she would meet no one she knew. She moved over to a very margin of her seat as a big man sat down beside her; he looked at her casually and then cried, "Why, if it isn't Daisy Miller!"

"I used to be Bill when we were in school together," he laughed.

Daisy looked up at him; perhaps it was the new hat, perhaps it was the consciousness of that smart suit, yet there was a charm about that shy, bird-like glance that touched William Armstrong.

"Just come back to civilization," he explained. "I'm going to surprise my people. It's a long run from Arizona to New York!"

"How wonderful!" Daisy exclaimed softly. "I've always thought that was about the most interesting place to live—" then for some unaccountable reason she blushed.

"Not for your kind!" Armstrong said gruffly.

He touched tentatively the rich fur on her coat.

"Oh, this!" said Daisy with disdain. "As if clothes matter!"

"When a girl's as pretty as you are, Daisy, I guess you're right!" he said heartily.

"I'd like to drop in and talk with you about God's country!" he said as he wrung her hand in farewell.

That was why two days later Daisy Miller, answering the telephone, said softly:

"I'm sorry, Mr. Baldwin, but I have another engagement tonight!"

"Congratulations!" Tom Winship cried, holding out his hand to his betting partner. "When it comes to a lady-killer, Art, I must admit you never fail." He pointed a jeering finger to the notice printed in the evening paper.

"The engagement of Miss Daisy Miller to Mr. William Armstrong of Tucson, Ariz., was announced . . . ."

Obstacles in Path of Stamping Out Slavery

Of the four principal slave nations, Abyssinia is the only one to make even a start for better things. China, Arabia and Liberia have done little to end slavery, despite protests from the League of Nations and most of its signatory powers.

That fact is the principal reason why Abyssinia was chosen as the spot for the British Anti-Slavery society's first great campaign against an institution which has persisted since the dawn of civilization.

Ras Tafari, the Abyssinian ruler, is undoubtedly trying to rid his nation of its 2,000,000 slaves, but there are many obstacles in his path.

Abyssinia is half-way between feudalism and barbarism. Many of the chiefs, while recognizing the authority of the king, maintain their own small armies and hold the power of life and death over all their subjects. Many of their soldiers are slaves, and to free them would greatly weaken their owners' power.

Some of the most powerful chiefs own as many as 15,000 slaves. To free them at one stroke would practically bankrupt the slave owners.

One strange angle is that the price of slaves is still constantly going up, despite the depression and the fear that slavery will be abolished.

Another difficulty is the fact that slaves are still smuggled into Abyssinia by traders who buy them in the British-controlled territory west of Ras Tafari's kingdom.

Protests made to the British government, it is hoped, will result in the stamping out of this practice in the near future.

AFTER 40
bowel trouble

Constipation may very easily become chronic after forty. And any continued constipation at that time of life may bring attacks of piles and a host of other unpleasant disorders.

Watch your bowels at any age. Guard them with particular care after forty. Whenever they need any help, remember a doctor should know what is best for them.

"Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin" is a doctor's prescription for the bowels. Tested by 47 years' practice, it has been found thoroughly effective in relieving constipation and its ills for men, women and children of all ages. It has proven perfectly safe even for babies. Made from fresh laxative herbs, pure pepsin and other harmless ingredients, it cannot gripe; will not sicken you or weaken you; can be used without harm as often as your breath is bad, or when your tongue is coated; whenever a headachy, bilious, gassy condition warns of constipation.

HAVE YOU Lost Vital Nerve Force?

A VITAL internal nerve force is lost if you become distressed with acid stomach, indigestion, gas, biliousness, "costiveness" — the body becomes flooded with poisons which eventually destroy health and energy. Read what Mrs. Matilda Moring of 217 Mott Ave., Faribault, Minn., says: "At one time I was suffering from liver ills and weak stomach, could hardly eat anything, my stomach was so weak and easily upset, but Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery helped my stomach and drove away the liver trouble as well."

WHY WORRY OVER "WEIGHT FOR AGE"?

Despite what must be recognized as general hard times, an increasing number of people appear to be "putting on weight." And they are alarmed about it, comments a writer in the Toronto Globe. A radio corporation broadcasting health exercises announces that during the present year it has received requests from 82,000 persons for information on how to get thin; and booklets on weight reducing are edging in among the best sellers.

It is hard to account for this. Until recently "skinny" people have been subjects of ridicule. Plump individuals wondered what was wrong with their emaciated acquaintances. Long ago it was held against one Cassius that he had "a lean and hungry look," and that "such men are dangerous." "Sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights," were the ones to be trusted. Now the portly and erstwhile self-satisfied members of the human family are trying to rid themselves of this reassuring contour. They are reducing. Fasting has become a cult. Vitamins have invaded menu cards. Calories have replaced the good old "helpings" that brought Tiny Tim back for more.

And in spite of all this the most casual observer may note that there are more stout people about than ever before. Perhaps the motor car accounts for it. Nowadays men and women do not walk; they "hop into the car" if the journey be only a city block. There are no pedestrians on the highways; and the auto certainly has something to do with this—made footwork unsafe.

"Oh, that this, too, too solid flesh would melt," has become the anguished cry of those of extending girth. But it won't melt under the motor car treatment. Hence there is a fevered turning to the vitamin, the calory, and to literature on reducing. This is one of the passing phases of a changing world. After a while these reducers will return to common sense views and realize that, as the years pass, it is a good thing to be putting on "weight for age."

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription makes weak women strong. No alcohol. Sold by druggists in tablets or liquid.—Adv.

—11—

David's remark about the daily grind of housework gave Paul his first cue to helpfulness. Mary began to find the kitchen fire built and the teakettle boiling when she came downstairs in the morning, the wood box filled, the furnace tended faithfully day and night, the porches and paths kept free from snow. On Monday mornings he appeared to empty washtubs and hang out clothes. At his instigation, Myra agreed to do all the baking for both houses until "things got straightened out." Violet undertook the mending, and Jane actually gave up a meeting of the Foreign Missionary society to finish the weekly sweeping. And when, in spite of all this relief, Mary paid for her long strain and quietly crumpled up in a heap on the floor one afternoon when Algy was out of danger, and Sylvia's grave was hidden with snow, Paul picked her up and laid her on the bed, loosening her dress and taking off her shoes as he called for help. Jane, fortunately, was in the house and undressed her while he went downstairs to telephone for Doctor Wells and to get a hot-water bottle and a hot stimulant ready. And when he saw that it was her inability to care for the boys that was worrying her more than anything else, he turned his attention mainly to them. It would have been hard to discover anyone more stupid and awkward in dealing with a little child than Paul was, but he did what he could. He did better than he realized and his reward was greater than he expected. The first time that the children fell upon him, almost simultaneously, with hugs and kisses, was when he came in with two small wooden snow shovels—"to use when Algy was outdoors again, in no time now." As he hugged and kissed them in return, his embarrassment was equaled only by the inner glow of contentment that permeated his being.

Mary, up again for the first time, came in to find them thus occupied. The inner glow of contentment changed to a leaping flame as Paul looked at her and saw the expression of surprise and gratitude on her pale face.

"You're awfully good to those children," she said softly.

"They're great kids. I never knew before how much fun a kid is. I thought they were horrid little nuisances," returned Paul apologetically.

Mary sat down beside him. "Blanche and Philip are coming home for Christmas," she said. "Isn't that nice? Cousin Violet has a letter saying they'll surely be here the twenty-fourth, and of course she's perfectly delighted."

"That is good news! Got any more?"

"I don't know whether you'll call it good or not—but Austin Gray is going to France. I think that's much the best thing he can do, really. He says it's only a matter of months now before the United States will be in the war, too. He's going over as an ambulance driver, but he says he can get transferred to 'the real job' later on if we do. He was just here to see you. I went downstairs for a minute just as he came in, but I didn't know you were here, so he didn't wait. He asked me to invite you to go to New York with him, after Christmas. He'll be there for a fortnight, at least, making final arrangements."

"New York!"

"Yes. Wouldn't you like to go? I thought you were crazy to get away from Hamstead."

"I'm not quite so crazy as I used to be."

"No, you're getting fairly sane!" said Mary with a little laugh that made his heart leap, "and—just as kind and thoughtful as you can be. But you ought to go. It'll be wonderful for you! And I'm sure you'd be a comfort to Austin, too. He must think so, or he wouldn't have asked you. You'll go, won't you, Paul?"

"Yes, of course. Especially if you think I'd better. Mary, wait a minute—" but she was gone.

After that, for the first time since they had "made up," Paul saw that she was avoiding him again. The fact gave him fresh food for thought. She was willing to be his cousin, his friend, his companion. She was grateful far beyond his deserving for the little he had been able to do to serve her. She had forgiven him freely for all he had done to hurt her. But more than that she could not and would not do and be.

Paul was now, for the first time in his life, deeply in love, and perhaps for that reason, daily going deeper—going deepest of all because he felt it to be absolutely hopeless. Well, he must hide it as best he could. That [illegible] not come into Mary's eyes again. He must accept the bitter knowledge that she regarded his love as something to fear, as part of his punishment. When Blanche and Philip arrived, he took Blanche's statements of what she thought of him—it was the first time she had seen him since the engagement had been broken—so quietly that she was frightened.

Philip was less surprised than she had expected, when she told him about it. He had been watching his brother-in-law closely and had come to the conclusion that he had either misjudged the boy at first, or that the latter had improved somewhat during the last few months.

"Let Paul alone, honey," he said. "He looks to me like a man who is working out his own salvation."

Paul, with the rest of the village, was glad to have his sister and brother-in-law at home; glad not only because he was fond of them, but because it was easier, in their presence to keep from saying the things he was longing to say to Mary—to keep, as he was longing still more, from touching her. Time, mercifully, softens everything—lovers' quarrels and children's sufferings and even the thought of the Valley of the Shadow. Austin was finding his solution. Algy, thin but thriving, was in his high chair at the table once more. Philip and Blanche, radiantly happy, were with them again. After Christmas day dinner, while the two little boys took their naps, Violet went to lie down, Seth to smoke his pipe, and Cousin Jane to help Myra, loaned for the occasion, with the dishes. The four young people were left alone together. And, as the door closed behind the last retreating elder, Philip suddenly snatched up Blanche and kissed her, announcing that he was so full of joy and dinner mixed, that he'd got to let off steam, some way, that very minute. And Blanche, curling up in his arms like a contented kitten, smiled and kissed him back. They settled down in the big winged chair before the fire together—

And Blanche Curling Up in His Arms Like a Contented Kitten.

Over their unconscious heads, Paul looked at Mary. Then he crossed to where she stood, and the expression on his face was unmistakable. Before he could speak, she fled from the room.

Paul went after her. She had almost reached the stairs. He stepped in front of her.

"See here, Mary," he said, "I can stand almost anything you want to do or say and I know I deserve it. But please don't look at me that way. I can't stand it."

"Well, don't look at me the way you did then."

"I'll try not to. I'm trying not to, all the time. I only thought—it's Christmas day—that perhaps you could, just once—I won't ask you again for a long time. . . ."

It is unfortunately true that many naturally sweet-tempered women, if they are also clever, take refuge, when they are hurt or frightened, in flippancy or sarcasm. It is to be hoped that they do not know how deeply they can wound with these weapons. But whether they do or not, Mary was no exception to this rule.

"Why should you care about it so much?" she quoted scathingly, "'a kiss doesn't mean anything.'"

Paul stepped to one side, leaving the passage upstairs clear for her. She went by him swiftly, her head up. Then, on the landing, she turned and came still more swiftly down.

"That wasn't fair," she said. "Please forgive me, Paul."

"No," he said slowly. "It wasn't fair, and it wasn't kind of you to remind me of it. But what I said was true. There are some kisses that don't mean anything in almost every fellow's life. They drink too much sometimes, too. I'm sorry, but it's so. But that doesn't mean they're hopeless drunkards and—degenerates. There hasn't been anything to drink, or any of that kind of kisses for me in a long time. You know that, and you know why, too. And you ought to know that it would mean more than anything in the world to me if I could kiss you again."

Paul had learned a good many valuable lessons in the last months. Mary learned one now. The boy was humble, but he was not abject. If he had a right to demand nothing else from her, he deserved and demanded, at least, fair play and respect.

"When you go to New York—" she began.

"You'll let me kiss you good-by?"

This was not at all what Mary had intended to say. She hesitated a minute, and then, in spite of herself, she nodded. Then she leaned forward and touched his cheek with her lips, so lightly that it seemed merely as if a flower had brushed it.

"The telephone is ringing," she said, over her shoulder and left him to answer it as she fled.

"I wonder if Mary and Paul are really going to make up, after all?" Philip asked Blanche, a few days later.

"Oh, I hope not—even if he is my brother! You wouldn't want her to marry him now that she's got such a splendid chance!"

"Splendid chance!"

"Yes. Of getting Mr. Hamlin. Why, if she took Paul, even if he was good enough for her, which of course he isn't, she'd be buried in Hamstead all the rest of her life!"

"Well, I shouldn't mind being buried in Hamstead, with someone I loved," Philip said. "What do you say about starting in to fix up the little law office for ourselves this spring after all? I know you didn't care much for the idea when I first suggested it. But I'd enjoy the work immensely, and I can probably get off for a month next summer."

"Oh, Philip, couldn't we go somewhere else? There's plenty of time for that! I'm crazy to see Bar Harbor or Newport."

"All right, honey, just as you prefer," he said quietly.

He left Hamstead with the growing certainty that Paul and Mary were "really making up." Violet shared this certainty and ran up several new bills on the strength of it. Mary came in and out of her house again as if nothing had ever happened. She helped with the preparations for Paul's departure for New York, with energy and interest. Austin had decided to go by way of Boston and they were therefore leaving on the morning train instead of the midnight. And when Paul came downstairs ready to start, he found Mary, and not Seth, waiting in the little old sleigh, to take him to the station.

She had, as Violet often remarked, "no style to her," and this morning she had even less than usual. It was bitterly cold, and she had on an old fur coat of her mother's, worn and shabby and out-of-date, a knitted hood of red wool, and red wool mittens. But Paul thought he had never seen her look half so lovely. She had seemed, since Christmas, so much less tired than for a long time, so much like his old playmate, his old sweetheart.

Mary drove, and they rode along, talking of trivial things, laughing often, until they had almost reached the village. Then Paul put his arm around her and laid his hand over hers.

"You promised me," he said softly.

Mary turned her face to his exactly as she might have done ten years before. Paul had meant above everything else, that this embrace should be gentle, reverent even, and he did not for one minute forget this. But he had not reckoned on its proving so utterly impossible to keep all traces of the passion that was surging through him from his lips, and when he felt the cold, soft cheek growing suddenly warm beneath them, involuntarily he sought her mouth. Instead of drawing away from him, as he instantly feared she might do, she returned his kiss. For one heavenly moment they clung to each other. Then he bent over and kissed the little red mittens holding the reins.

"You dear girl," he murmured. "My own dear Mary—" and suddenly seeing tears in her eyes, he exclaimed, "I didn't hurt you, did I, darling? I wouldn't have, for the world!"

"No— Oh, no!"

"What is it then, sweetheart?"

"Hush! You mustn't call me that," she whispered. "I didn't realize, when I promised, that you wanted that kind of a kiss. I thought it was just for—for a proof that we were friends again—for always."

"We are friends again for always. And that's all I did expect. But of course this was the kind I wanted, even if—"

"It wasn't fair."

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean to, on my word of honor. But you kissed back!" he ended exultantly.

"I know I did. That's what wasn't fair. I—couldn't seem to help it. You were so—so—you meant it so!"

"I'm glad you see that now," he said quietly. But his heart was singing.

Boston's Short Street

There are few shorter streets in the world than Franklin avenue, in Boston. Some 35 feet long, it connects Brattle street with Cornhill, in downtown Boston. Little more than a glorified alley, Franklin avenue nevertheless is designated by a shiny name plate like the city's longer thoroughfares.

YESTERDAY AND TODAY

Half of the fun of childhood used to be longing for the unattainable. The small boy with a homemade cart, or a battered train of cars minus most of the wheels, could play all day and be wondrously happy with his few possessions. Likewise the small girl, cherishing a rag doll and and perhaps one "best" doll with flaxen hair and eyes that used to close, could "play house" and feel that the world was a grand place in which to live. Not so now, however. Toys have been improved, parents have been educated to buy more of them, children have learned to compare their collection with that of the children next door, and howl their heads off if Jane has a real electric stove and Bobby has a chemical set when they have not.—New London Day.

Sickness and Accident

For less than 20c a month

This was the record of the Minnesota Benevolent Society during the period from Dec. 1, 1932 to April 1, 1933, a period having more sickness than usual.

Three 25-cent donations were called for from members, to pay 180 doctor bills and 40 hospital bills.

WHY be without sickness and accident protection when it is that cheap?

Conjuring with Cans

PRESTO! No rabbits jump from your hat, no eggs drop out of purple silk handkerchiefs, nor captive maidens disappear from trunks. But it's something of a stunt, just the same, to give a simple twist of the wrist to two cans and produce a Down East Clam Chowder, savory enough to suit an old salt, or a homesick family from Gloucester.

Here Is the Trick

Ready? Then roll up your sleeves to prove there aren't any live clams tucked away up there; open a can of vegetable soup—some kinds contain twenty-one different kinds of vegetables, more than a housewife could cut up in a couple of hours; then open a can of soft shell clams. Toss the two together in a saucepan, simmer gently and serve Down East Clam Chowder with pilot crackers and no apologies.

And next, if you'll step right up, ladies and gentlemen, we'll put in a can of corn and a can of tomatoes, and some cream sauce, and pull out a genuine Creole soup. With three tablespoons of butter, three tablespoons of flour and three cups of milk we make the white sauce. Now we toss together a cup of canned corn and a cup and a half of canned tomatoes, stew them for ten minutes, press through a sieve and add the white sauce. Shake in a little salt and pepper, serve with toasted crackers—and here you are—a corking good Creole soup!*

Trade at Home and keep the Almighty Dollar in the neighborhood.

Safety First

SAFETY first should be the rule this year when there has been so much home canning. Don't take any risks. It is impracticable and dangerous to attempt to can non-acid vegetables at home without a pressure cooker, and unsafe to eat non-acid vegetables that have been so canned.

Dr. A. F. Woods, Director of Scientific Work of the Department of Agriculture, made a statement on this subject in 1929. He said at that time:

"Research and practical experience have demonstrated that non-acid food products, like asparagus, beans, corn, peas, beets, spinach, meats and fish cannot be safely canned by processing in boiling water but must be sterilized under pressure with approved time and temperature.

Cookers Cost Little

"Pressure cookers are now standard equipment and are readily available at small cost. The Department does not recommend any particular make, although it is important that the pressure kettle be equipped with thermometer and pressure gauge for proper control.

"There is now no excuse for continuing to take risks involved in canning non-acid foods without adequate pressure cookers.

"All recommendations of this Department will hereafter make this clear and emphatic."

In further support of this timely warning, the United States Department of Agriculture Farmers' Bulletin No. 1471 (Revised June, 1931) entitled "Canning Fruits and Vegetables at Home" contains the following statement:

"Process all these vegetables in the pressure canner. If no pressure canner is available, it is recommended that methods of preservation other than canning be used."*

Passed Away

Mrs. A. H. Langlie, pioneer of this community passed away at her farm home west of here yesterday morning.

20 Years Ago

Facts Gleaned From The Northern Light for the Issue of April 25, 1913.

"P. L. Anderson and Eugene Hance took a couple of young lady friends out for an auto ride in Pete's car Tuesday evening. They had a hard time, and returned home on foot in the small hours of the morning. Ole Reierson's boys discovered the car standing peacefully in a mud hole next afternoon and rescued it with their ox team."

CITATION FOR HEARING ON PETITION FOR ADMINISTRATION.

State of Minnesota }
County of Marshall } SS.

IN PROBATE COURT

In the Matter of the Estate of Rudolph S. Reierson, Decedent.

The State of Minnesota to all persons interested in the granting of Administration of the estate of said decedent. The petition of Oscar Reierson having been filed in this court, representing that Rudolph S. Reierson, then a resident of the County of Marshall, State of Minnesota, died intestate on the 13th day of August, 1921; and praying that letters of Administration of his estate be granted to T. B. Folden; and the court, having fixed the time and place for hearing said petition.

Therefore, You, And Each Of You, are hereby cited and required to show cause, if any you have, before this court at the Probate Court Rooms in the Court House, in the city of Warren, in the County of Marshall, State of Minnesota, on the 28th day of April, 1933, at 10 o'clock A. M., why said petition should not be granted.

Witness, the Judge of said Court, and the Seal of said Court, this 3rd day of April, 1933.

4-H Club Makes Project of Park Around Bandstand

T. M. McCall from the Northwest School at Crookson was up here on Saturday and met with several of the businessmen from this village and many of the leaders and members of the local 4-H club. The nature of this meeting, which was held in the afternoon near the village band stand, was to discuss and form a plan for maintaining the grounds around the stand for a public park.

The Holt 4-H club has taken it up as one of their projects to do planting of flowers, trees and shrubs on the grounds. But before this could be done they asked to have some one outline the plans for planting and as what to plant that would be suitable for both the soil and scenery. Mr. McCall, who is an expert at this kind of work gave 40 minute talk on landscaping, planting and caring for trees and shrubs and, drew up a plan for the 4-H club to follow in beautifying the grounds.

He also stressed the fact that we should not plant only for to make the grounds attractive for this or next year but, years to come—leave it as a living monument to show the public spirit and cooperation and forsight of those who lived to-day. There is not anything more beautiful than a park in a small town.

On Saturday afternoon the men and boys of the village are asked to come to the band stand to help clean up and level off the ground and make it ready for planting. Bring a rake, shovel, hoe or wheelbarrow or whatever you have plus a lot of cooperative spirit. Come and show that you are interested in what a few local citizens are plugging for to make our town a finer place in which to live.

Any one who has trees or any kind of bushes or shrubs to give for this cause are invited to give whatever they want to and you may leave your name and name of plants you wish to give with Einer Loven.

All together now and in a few years you can lounge around on a nice green lawn beneath a big shade tree and feel proud of the fact that you can be mentioned as one of the sponsors of a public park.

Telephone Meeting Saturday Night Was Stormy Affair

A crowd of about 25 men came in Saturday night to attend the big telephone meeting. It was kid glove affair but, if some one would have donated the boxing gloves we think the final round would have come off two hours before a meeting which lastsed until midnight, would have ended. Much was said about the telephone service as it is, and as to what it should be.

Before the meeting ended it was decided that local telephone company officials inquire from the Garden Valley company if they would buy out the local companies and see if we could not again have a real telephone service in our community.

The only objectors were those who never pay their dues or fix up the lines.

SCHOOL NOTES

HIGH SCHOOL

The High School girls have organized their two kittenball teams, the Poor Excuses and the Northwest Howlers. As yet the Poor Excuses are ahead.

The boys' chief object these days is basketball.

Upper Grades

These pupils are on the honor roll for the fifth six weeks' period:

Sixth Grade: Opal Werner, Lorna Peterson, and Robert Sandberg.

Seventh Grade: Arnold Peterson, Glenn Carlson, and Opal Sanoden.

Eighth Grade: Orlene Hagglund, Gertrude Nohre, and Eleanor Peterson.

Grades III, IV and V

The following had one hundred in Spelling on Friday:

Third Grade: Ruby Werner, Betty Lou Lorentson, Lois Hanson, and Rubin Ness.

Fourth: Roy Hagberg, Helen Wahlin, Marion Olson.

Fifth: Milton Hanson, Palma Johnson, Vernice Tollefsrud, Myrtle Ness.

Grades I and II

The following children had 100 in Spelling the Friday before vacation: Marion, Lillian, Ruby, Roy, Wayne, Irene, and Harriet. Last Friday Marian, Lillian, Roy, Ruby, Wayne, Rueben, and Elaine had 100.

In second grade Language class we have been studying Japan. Today we colored salt from which we are going to make pictures the way the Japanese make pictures of colored sand.

In Nature class we have been studying the frog. We have been watching the development of the frog's eggs. We have several tadpoles now.

Cox, Conservation Head, Discharged By Commission

W. T. Cox, head of the state conservation department since August, 1931, was discharged Saturday by the Minnesota conservation commission.

Cox, under suspension since February 11, when the commission charged him with inefficiency, refused to submit to questioning by members at an all-day hearing which preceded the ouster by a three to one vote. Cox issued a statement, however, denying the accusation.

It was the second removal from Minnesota office for Cox. The state forestry board discharged him as state forester in 1926.

After leaving that position and before coming back, he was superintendent of the federal upper Mississippi wild life and fish refuge, with headquarters at Winona, Mind., and government forester for Brazil.

One member of the commission, J. T. Williams of Minneapolis, was excused from voting as he has already submitted his resignation to Governor Olson effective May 1.

E. V. Willard, state director of drainage and waters, who has been acting commissioner of conservation since Cox was suspended, will continue in that capacity pending a permanent selection.

Lufkin-Nohre Nuptials

Miss Myrtle Lufkin, daughter of Mr. A. E. Lufkin of Thief River Falls, and Henry Nohre, son of Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Nohre of Holt, were united in marriage Sunday, April 23, at a 3 o'clock wedding in the Scandinavian Evangelical Free Church. Rev. J. O. Jacobsen, pastor of the church, performed the ceremony.

The vows were spoken before an altar decorated with ferns and primroses. The wedding march was played by Miss Helen Reierson, cousin of the bride. The couple was attended by Mrs. Edgar Horien, sister of the groom, as maid of honor, Miss Ethel Lufkin, sister of the bride, as bridesmaid, Arthur Lufkin, brother of the bride, as best man, and Elmer Nohre as second best man.

The bride wore an orchid silk dress and carried a beautiful bouquet of American beauty roses and orchid and white sweet peas. Mrs. Edgar Horien, maid of honor, wore a pale yellow silk dress. Miss Esther Lufkin, bridesmaid, wore a pale pink silk dress. The flower girl, Harriet Lufkin, sister of the bride, wore a white silk dress and carried a basket of sweet peas.

Before the marriage ceremony Mrs. Oliver Nohre sang "O Promise Me." As the wedding march was played, the bridesmaid entered with the second best man. They were followed by the maid of honor and the first best man. Then the groom and the ring bearer, Milton Reierson, cousin of the bride, entered. They were followed by the flower girl and the bride. The flower girl scattered sweet peas before the bride as she walked down the aisle toward the altar.

At the close of the ceremony Mrs. Leonard Poppenhagen sang "I Love You Truly."

A reception and lunch was given in the church parlors to sixty-five guests following the ceremony. The Misses Mabel Moen, Borghild Johnson, Mae Lundquist, Beaulah Bennes, Greta Fredrickson, Ruth Turnwall, and Edna Steien were waitresses. They wore white dresses and orchid and white aprons. The church parlors were decorated in orchid and white.

The bride, who is well known in Thief River Falls, was a graduate of Lincoln High School of the class of 1930. She has been making her home since at the home of her father at 712 Main Ave. North, Thief River Falls.

The groom has spent his boyhood and school days with his parents here, and since finishing school has been engaged in farming in partnership with his father. Early this spring the groom began farming for himself four miles northwest of Holt, where Mr. and Mrs. Nohre will make their home.

The News joins the community in wishing the young couple the best of luck.

Tax Collections Drop

Tax collections in Marshall county took another drastic drop during the period of Nov. 1, 1932 and April 1, the collections totaling only $82,915, whereas during a similar period a year ago the collections totaled up to $114,544 59, according to the March Settlement statement completed this week in the office of Levi G. Johnson, Co. auditor.

The March settlement this year is approximately one month later than usual due to the extension of time granted for the payment of personal property taxes by the Minnesota legislature. In spite of the extension of time the collections this year were $31,629.59 less than a year ago, a comparison reveals.

Public schools in the county received $41,547.91 from the total amount collected while the county goverment received the next highest amount with $26,737.25. The townships and villages received $16,072.99, while the state received $8,556.85. —Warren Sheaf.

Declamatory Contest

The Holt Sectional Declamatory Contest will be held Thursday evening May 4 at 8 p. m., in the Holt School Auditorium. Rural schools in the Holt district will compete and the winners will go to the County Declamatory Contest to be held at Warren at a later date.

The public is invited to attend this contest. There will be no admission charge.

Large Crowd At 4-H Meeting

A crowd of over two-hundred people from this community attended the Holt 4-H club meeting in the Sunnyside school on Friday evening. The Holt Community Band was there and gave a snappy musical program.

The 4-H club has a membership of 50 young boys and girls who are up and coming--having already laid their plans for many worthwhile projects which they are going to work out this year

State To Liquidate Rural Credit Bureau

Governor Olson signed Saturday a legislative measure under which the state rural credit bureau will be liquidated over a 35-year peried by direction of a conservator.

This means the end on July 1 of loaning to farmers by an enterprise set up in 1923. The bureau has assets of $61,000,000 and liabilities of $64,000,000, a a recent report showes. Some officials contend the state will lose $20,000,000 before the affairs are liquidated.

The governor also signed acts calling for licenses for all automobile drivers over 15 years of age, and a drivers' financial liability measure, to be invoked in case of mishaps.

Governor Olson also signed the statutory income tax bill. Under it all incomes over $1,200 for unmarried persons and over $2,000 for the heads of households and married persons, are taxable.

Additional exemption of $250 for each person other than husband or wife, dependent on the head of the family for support, also is granted.

The first taxable year for all taxes will be 1933, based on taxable net income received or accrued on or after January 1, last.

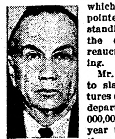
Secretary Roper Offers Plan for Big Cut in Commerce Department Expenses; Congress Tackles Legislation for Relief of Small Home Owners.



Secretary Roper

SECRETARY of Commerce Roper has laid before President Roosevelt a plan to make drastic reductions in the expense of his department which has long been pointed to as an outstanding example of the extravagant bureaucracy of Washing. Mr. Roper proposes to slash the expenditures of the Commerce department from $45,000,000 in the current year to $26,000,000 in the next fiscal year, a reduction of $19,000,000, or 42 per cent.

If the report is approved, and Secretary Roper is successful in operating his department at such a saving, it is believed he will proportionately far outdistance in economy promotion any of the other departments.

The secretary plans to consolidate many activities of the department and to abandon others. The figure of $26,000,000, which he proposes spending in the 1934 fiscal year, beginning next July 1, is not only 42 per cent under the 1933 figure, but it is nearly $11,000,000 under the actual appropriations made for 1934 by the last congress. The appropriation bills carry an expenditure of $36,605,405 for the Commerce department in 1934.

This is the first time in the history of the government, according to Secretary Roper, that an administration has suggested it is not wise or safe to use money which congress itself has appropriated, but he declared that the administration intended to carry out faithfully its campaign pledges of economy.

Mr. Roper plans to establish six bureaus to take over the work heretofore done by ten. The six bureaus will be the transportation, patents, census, standards, fisheries and foreign and domestic commerce.

The bureau of transportation will embody a supervision of the government over all forms of transportation, land, air and water. The Roper plan contemplates merging under one subordinate to become the new assistant secretary of commerce for transportation, supervision over the Interstate Commerce commission, and the activities of the United States shipping board; the Agriculture department's bureau of weather and public roads; the federal radio commission, the Commerce department's bureau of aeronautics, geodetic survey, lighthouses and navigation, steamboat inspection; the War department's inland waterways corporation; the naval observatory, and the national advisory committee for aeronautics.

Sen. Norris

THE ambitious scheme, conceived by President Roosevelt, to make the Tennessee river valley the scene of an industrial, economical and social experiment, has been laid before congress in a brief message.

Mr. Roosevelt's hope is to demonstrate in the Tennessee valley that great economic changes for the better can be made by conserving and developing natural resources.

"Such use, if envisioned in its entirety," said the President in his message, "transcends mere power development; it enters the wide field of flood control, soil erosion, afforestation, elimination from agricultural use of marginal lands, and distribution and diversification of industry.

"In short, this power development of war days leads logically to national planning for a complete river watershed involving many states and the future lives and welfare of millions. It touches and gives life to all forms of human concerns.

"I, therefore, suggest to the congress legislation to create a Tennessee valley authority—a corporation clothed with the power of government but possessed of the flexibility and initiative of a private enterprise.

"It should be charged with the broadest duty of planning for the proper use, conservation and development of the natural resources of the Tennessee river drainage basin and its adjoining territory for the general social and economic welfare of the nation. This authority should also be clothed with the necessary power to carry these plans into effect."

The President's plan includes the running of electric power into every farm, to control crop productions, to build dams and promote forestation projects in the interest of relieving unemployment. It is a far-reaching plan which will take years to work out, but if a plan is agreed upon and it appears successful even before it is fully tried out, the President expects to apply similar projects to other river valleys of the nation.

To carry out the President's scheme Senator Norris of Nebraska introduced in the senate a bill for government operation of the huge war-time power and nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals, which to date has cost the American taxpayers some $150,000,000. In the house a bill similar to the Norris bill was introduced by Representative McSwain, Democrat, of South Carolina.

RELIEF for small home owners who are staggering under $20,000,000,000 of mortgage debts is asked by President Roosevelt in a special message to congress. Bills with that end in view were introduced in both houses.

In his message the President laid down a new national policy to protect owners of homes valued at not more than $10,000 from foreclosure and excessive interest rates as the next step in his program for economic recovery.

The proposed legislation would set up the Home Owners' Loan corporation, to be organized and operated by the federal home loan bank board, for the direct and immediate relief of small owners and holders of small home mortgages. The corporation would have a capital of $200,000,000 subscribed by the treasury and would be authorized to issue 4 per cent bonds up to $200,000,000. These bonds would be exchanged for mortgages on homes not exceeding $10,000 in value, up to 80 per cent of the property value.

Home owners would pay 5 per cent interest to the corporation, with fifteen years to pay off the loan. A special provision is made for a moratorium, not exceeding three years, on interest and principal payments.

Direct loans, up to 80 per cent of the assessed value of the property, may be made by the corporation to home owners, if the property is not otherwise encumbered.

Secretary Woodin

SECRETARY of the Treasury Woodin has laid down the law to the New York clearing house, composed of twenty of the biggest banks in the city. He has told the clearing house banks, in diplomatic language, that they must keep their word and make good the deposits of the Harriman National Bank and Trust company, now in the hands of a federal conservator. The pressure brought by Woodin, it is expected, will cost the clearing house banks in the vicinity of $6,000,000.

The firm stand of the secretary was made known simultaneously with the arraignment in court of Joseph W. Harriman, former chairman and president of the bank bearing his name. Mr. Harriman, ill since his arrest, was brought into court in a wheel chair. The indictment charges that he caused false entries to be made in the bank's books, covering the use of $1,713,225 of the depositors' money for speculation in the bank's stock.

Secretary Woodin's action is based on a pledge given to the controller of the treasury at a time when the bank was in financial difficulties, that the clearing house would support the bank.

PETITIONS have been filed with the United States senate from citizens of Louisiana demanding the removal of Huey P. Long as senator from that state. The petitions accuse the senator of personal dishonesty and corruptness.

The petitioners asserted they could furnish witnesses to establish that Long "was personally dishonest, corrupt and immoral," and added Long's continuance in office "is repulsive to the respectable and law-abiding citizens of Louisiana and to the nation."

They contended, among other things, that Long had "created and maintained in Louisiana a system of corruption and debauchery unparalleled in the history of the state."

FEDERAL legislation for a 30-hour working week in industry was assured when the administration placed itself squarely behind the measure. The bill has already passed the senate, and it is expected to be quickly approved by the house and signed by the President.

The bill, regarded as one of the most radical labor measures to win the administration support, provides in its present form that for an emergency period of two years no articles may be received in interstate shipment which have been manufactured or produced by labor working more than six hours in any day, or more than five days in any week.

BY A vote of 99 to 1 Michigan's constitutional convention went on record as favoring the abolition of the Eighteenth amendment, and so Michigan has the distinction of being the first state to ratify the Twenty-first, or repealer, amendment submitted by congress.

There were great cheers and hand clapping when the roll was called on the ratification of the Twenty-first amendment. The lone dry vote was cast by Eugene Davenport of Hastings, Barry county, former dean of the college of agriculture of the University of Illinois.

ACTION on the farm relief bill was delayed by a controversy aroused over the Simpson price-fixing plan which has been written into the administration bill. This developed at a time when the Roosevelt program for increasing the farmers' income and lifting the burden of mortgages was bumping along on a rough road sprinkled with demands for currency expansion as a means of restoring agriculture.

The mortgage section of the administration bill is almost certain to have the approval of the house.

In anticipation of the passage of the bill, Henry Morgenthau, chairman of the federal farm board, is getting his department fully prepared to speed the actual application of the relief.

Some delays in putting into effect all the credit relief facilities planned by President Roosevelt and Mr. Morgenthau will be occasioned by reason of the fact that the consolidation order under which the President joined all farm credit activities doesn't become effective for a period of about six weeks.

But Mr. Morgenthau has reached out into the other agencies which soon will come under his head, and as soon as the credit bill becomes law he expects to bring about a prompt organization of the work of issuing 4½ per cent bonds to be exchanged for the present farm mortgages averaging higher than 6½ per cent.

President Roosevelt is reported to be firmly of the opinion that the biggest help that can be given to the farmers at this time is a loosening of their credit. Once the farmers' debts are erased, debts contracted when land values were high and crop prices up, it may not be necessary, in the opinion of many of the administration advisers outside the group controlled by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, to resort to price fixing and allotment schemes, to help the farmer.

A 2-CENT postal rate within cities, retaining the 3-cent rate for interdistrict postage, is recommended in a plan for balancing the post office budget submitted to President Roosevelt by Postmaster General Farley. It is Mr. Farley's hope that by increased postal revenues and a program of economy, to balance the budget, which at the present rate is running into an annual deficit of $132,000,000.

The postmaster general said he had received opinions that if the postal rate is cut the volume of business will be so restored as to yield greatly increased revenues, and he added that some advisers felt that a flat 2-cent letter postal rate over the country would bring in enough revenue to balance the postal budget.

The postmaster general also disclosed a study is being made on whether the department shall continue the heretofore somewhat farcical practice of giving examinations to first and second-class postmasters.

EDUCATION, literature and religion lost one of its most distinguished leaders in the death of Dr. Henry Van Dyke, war-time ambassador to the Netherlands and Luxemburg. He died in his sleep at Avalon, his home in Princeton, N. J. He was eighty years of age.

Dr. Van Dyke had succeeded, as one of his friends said as "poet-critic-essayist-novelist, educator-lecturer-fisherman-pulpiteer." Dr. Van Dyke resigned his diplomatic post in 1917 so that he might say what he thought about the World war.

Holding degrees from several American universities, he also had been honored by Oxford and the University of Geneva. He was commander of the Legion of Honor, had been president of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, was moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church in America in 1902 and 1903, and from 1900 to 1923 held the chair of English literature at Princeton university.

Premier MacDonald

THE immense importance attached to the Washington conference by the British is indicated in the personnel of the party accompanying Premier MacDonald. No more important group of British officials has ever gone abroad, and it is evident that much is expected from the meeting between the British prime minister and President Roosevelt.

The chief delegate after MacDonald himself is Sir Robert Vansittart, permanent undersecretary of the foreign office. Sir Robert is the permanent chief of the foreign office, no matter what foreign secretaries come and go, and all the threads of British diplomacy are in his hands. He knows America well, his first wife having been an American.

The next member of the party is Sir Frederick Leith-Ross, treasury expert, who has represented Great Britain at all financial meetings for some years. The third member is A. E. Overton, assistant secretary of the board of trade, whose specialty is tariffs and international trade relations.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S invitation to Japan to join the trade and political conferences in Washington has caused a complete change in the attitude of Japan toward America practically overnight. Friends of America express jubilation, seeing the first ray of hope for the return of relations between the two nations to the friendly state existing before the Mukden incident on September 18, 1931.

Japan not only is gladly accepting the invitation but the question is being made of the greatest importance.

New York, to Paul, was not the glittering wonder that it is to most boys, seeing it at his age for the first time. Nothing thrilled him at all. The vivid memory of the touch of Mary's lips, the thrill of that frosty kiss, still obliterated every other emotion. He finally went to the department store where he knew Rosalie King worked, and sought her out. She was not very cordial to him. Girls, Paul reflected, had inconveniently long memories for a fellow's shortcomings. But when he gave voice to his lonesomeness and depression, she warmed to him at once. Paul was by no means the only person whom Sylvia had sized up correctly.

Business was a little dull that morning. Paul leaned over the counter and told his story, with the conspicuous omission of some of the most important parts. He told enough, however, for Rosalie to guess a good deal more and what she guessed moved her not a little. When he finished, she needed to repowder her nose.

"Why don't you pick out something swell to take home to her?" she asked. "She likes blue, don't she? I got a bracelet here, with sapphires in it, that's classy down to the ground."

Paul bought the bracelet, but he reflected. The houses at Lady Blanche farm, like most of those in Hamstead during the last decade, had been equipped with bathrooms and furnaces and when at the time of Blanche's wedding, Violet had put electric lights in hers, Seth and Jane had done the same. But they had no settubs, no electrical labor-saving devices, no elaborate short-cuts to comfort and leisure. Paul began to wonder if he would not have done better to buy an electric washing machine and a vacuum cleaner than a sapphire bracelet. He asked Rosalie what she thought.

"Couldn't you get her both?"

"I'm afraid not, just now," he said regretfully.

The next day Austin sailed, and Paul was free to go home again.

It was late in the evening when, after a long, cold journey, he reached the Hamstead station. Seth was waiting for him in the sleigh, and they were soon jingling along through heavy snow down the road to Lady Blanche farm.

How still it was, how cold and white! How clean and open and friendly! Paul wondered that he had ever, for one single instant, imagined that he would prefer to live in a city, in that dreadful strangeness, that hurry and dirt and noise! Not that seeing New York hadn't been a wonderful experience, of course. But it was much more wonderful getting home after it, and it was going to be most wonderful of all telling Mary what he had seen, what he had felt, what he had divined—watching the light in the steady gray eyes, the expression on the changing mouth. And perhaps now—of course it wouldn't do to force the issue, even no , but perhaps—

"Is it too late to see Mary tonight?" he asked suddenly, feeling in his pocket to see if the sapphire bracelet was surely safe.

"Geddap, King," said Seth, addressing the wholly unregal creature that was taking them on their way. "What ails you, Paul, ain't you ben listenin' to what I ben sayin' to you these last five minutes?"

"No," said Paul breathlessly. "I—I was thinking. She—she isn't sick, is she?"

"Well," said Seth slowly, "I guess she's ben sick—ailin', anyway—for some time, longer'n we realized. She's worked real hard ever since her mother died. Mary ain't one to shirk, of course, and not bein' experienced, it made it harder for her. Then she was considerable upset over that trouble you and she had in the summer. And she took Sylvia's death a good deal to heart. Mary don't say much, and I never saw her cry or git 'nervous' like your ma. But you remember she fainted dead away one time just after Algy begun to get better—sorter dropped in her tracks? She seemed to perk up again 'round Christmas, but danged if she didn't keel right over again the day after you left for Noo York. Now she's gone."

"Gone!" echoed Paul, an icy terror clutching at his heart. "You mean she's dead?"

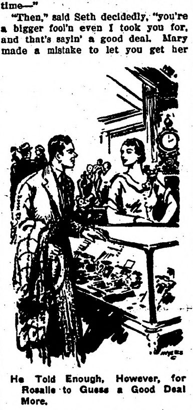
"No, she ain't dead! Land, Paul, you must be gettin' nervous yourself. Geddap, King. She's gone to Boston, to visit that friend of hers, Hannah Adams, that's been teasin' her to come for so long. Moses and Algy and I hev moved over to Jane's to stay until she gets back. I kinder think that's what we oughter hev done in the first place, after Laura died, until Mary had finished her schoolin' and got her growth and strength. Jane says she don't see how Mary ever done so much work. We've had to get in Myra's niece from out back, to help her, and send the wash up to the steam laundry in Wallacetown besides, and buy bread once or twice, and still she's ben on the jump every minute. I guess Mary put a good deal of vitality into her job. Well, I give her Laura's money before she went, without any strings tied to it. It ain't much, but it's somethin'."

"Do you think," asked Paul, choking a little, "that there was any other reason, that anything happened just before I left, that made Mary want to go away—besides just because she was tired?" and as he asked the question, the boy seemed to feel her face pressed against his, the ecstasy of that swift, passionate kiss that she returned, and to see the sudden tears in her eyes afterwards.

Seth considered this question carefully before he answered it. "Well," he said at length, "women's queer. I don't pretend to understand 'em. But Mary thought a lot of you, and you jilted her. That's the plain English of it, ain't it? I guess it hurt her a good deal, and it was a long while, as I don't need to tell you, before she could bring herself to speak to you again. But sence that night that Algy took sick, and you helped her out so good, she gradually got to be friends with you again. She was real grateful to you, and I guess she still likes you some, in spite of everything. Mary's like that. She don't change easy. And she could see that you was tryin' to do better. I want to give you credit for that myself, Paul. Mary ain't harborin' what you done against you any more, but she ain't forgot that you done it, and she ain't certain you wouldn't do it again. . . . Wal, of course I don't want to pry, and I ain't askin' you no questions. . . ."

"I—I—had begun to hope that some time—"

"Then," said Seth decidedly, "you're a bigger fool'n even I took you for, and that's sayin' a good deal. Mary made a mistake to let you get her easy before and to let you treat her neglectful after you did get her. She wouldn't make a mistake like that again, even if she wanted you, and I don't believe she does. Anyway, she don't trust you, and I'm dummed if I blame her. I look to see her be gone from here some time. And that ain't all."



He Told Enough, However, for Rosalie to Guess a Good Deal More.

Paul waited, his heart sinking lower than ever.

"I got a letter from Mr. Hamlin, the architect," said Seth, "that was a considerable surprise to me. He says he asked Mary to marry him three years ago, when her mother died. And she turned him down because she thought Moses and Algy and me needed her, and because she was comin' home—to you. It shows she didn't have as much sense as she might hev, or she never would hev refused a man like that to stick to a boy like you. But I hope she's acquired a little sense. Anyway, he says he's glad to understand that conditions hev changed somewhat now and he wanted I should give my consent to try his luck again. Consent! Great Godfrey! I writ by return mail! Geddap, King!"

Late that night, when everyone else had gone to bed, Paul went outdoors and stood for a long time, looking towards the unlighted windows of the house across the road. Adam, facing the angel with the flaming sword which barred the gate into Eden, could have felt no surer that he had lost Paradise through his own wrongdoing than did this humbled and heartsick boy.

CHAPTER XI

The sun, streaming into the pretty living room, fell on Blanche's golden hair and turned the color of her delicate negligee from palest pink to rose. She was, her husband reflected, growing lovelier and lovelier with every month that passed. Just now, however, her face wore the expression of slight discontent which at first he had noticed only when she spoke of the dullness of Hamstead and which had left it altogether during the first radiant weeks of their marriage.

"What's the matter, honey?"

"Nothing, except that I'm wishing I was a nymph again."

Philip laughed.

"The first time I heard you say that was because you wanted to get away from spring cleaning," he said lightly, "and the second, when you had to go to an intelligence office and engage a maid. The third time was when you tried in vain to crank the car on a cold day and I got home and found you nearly crying over it. What's the matter this time?"

"Bills," said Blanche briefly.

"Bills?" echoed Philip. "Why, I should think those were one of the last things that need trouble you. We've plenty of money to pay bills for all the things we really need. You silly child, hand them over—"

She gathered the fluttering sheets on the desk and gave them to him. Then, watching his face as he began to glance through them, she suddenly burst out, "I'm sure I've tried to be careful! We have only one maid, instead of three or four, and an apartment instead of a house, like almost everyone we know. And I really don't spend anything on clothes compared to the other young married women I've met this winter. And we don't go to the theater or entertain much or—"

"I know, darling. It does seem to cost a lot, just to live. I didn't realize how much, beforehand. But after all, we had a lovely trip and we've been pretty comfortable and happy in this little apartment. And I can take care of all these all right. But I guess we shall have to go a little slow for a while."

"Well, it's lucky we haven't had a baby! I don't know what you'd have said about bills then! And yet you've been perfectly crazy—"

Something about Philip's silence halted Blanche. She decided that it was wiser to change the subject.

"I had a letter from Paul last night," she said. "I meant to speak of it before. I guess he's rather fed up with Lady Blanche farm, too. At any rate, he wants to come to Boston for a week or so and asks if it would be convenient for us to have him here."

Philip hesitated. He felt that the present state of his finances could ill permit him to give his brother-in-law the kind of a good time he would expect if he came to town. On the other hand, he was curious to see if the more favorable impressions which he had gained of the boy at Christmas time would prove to be lasting.

"Of course, if Paul is coming to Boston, we must have him here," he said pleasantly.

Paul appeared three days later, and Philip, with his usual fairmindedness, confessed to himself that the boy was still more changed, and though differently, it was certainly not for the worse. He seemed much older, much quieter, and decidedly preoccupied.

"Yes, of course I'd enjoy going to the theater," he said a trifle absently. "Thanks awfully. Or anything else you've planned. First of all, though, if you don't mind, I'd like to go and see Mary. I—I haven't heard from her at all, except indirectly, since before I went to New York. Do you think she's had a pleasant winter?"

"Pleasant winter!" exclaimed Blanche. "Why, she's had a wonderful time! She's packed these few months pretty full, I can tell you! And I must say she's a great success. I don't believe she'll turn her back on it all a second time in a hurry! Mary is nice, there's no denying that, and awfully clever, too, and you'd never believe the difference good-looking clothes have made in her appearance."

"And she's had time to rest and read," cut in Philip, "which I think has meant more to her than almost anything else. The first week she was here she was in bed most of the time. Then she began to go for a daily ride and to pick up generally. Mr. Hamlin's pretty attentive to her."

"Pretty attentive!" Blanche echoed her husband. "Why, he follows her like a shadow! Wasn't she queer not to tell us that he was after her before—and not to accept him? I don't see how she could have hesitated a minute!"

"I'm glad she's had a good time," was Paul's only comment at the end of these and similar disclosures. "I want to see her myself."

"Well, let's go to the theater tonight, and you can go there tomorrow afternoon."

There was an amusing farce running at the Park Square theater and as the curtain went down after the first act and the lights came on, Blanche, wiping the tears of merriment from her eyes, gave Paul a sudden nudge.

"Look!" she whispered, "in the first box on the right!"

Paul turned in the direction indicated. The box contained six persons—a middle-aged man and woman, two younger men, one of them in khaki, and two girls. At the first glance, that was all Paul realized. Then it came over him that the two older persons were Mr. and Mrs. Adams, one of the young men, Gale Hamlin, one of the girls Hannah Adams and the other—the one in white brocade, with the rose-colored velvet wrap flung over the back of her chair and the big bunch of orchids and lilies of the valley at her waist—was Mary Manning, whom he had last seen wearing a red knitted hood, and shabby little red wool mittens—

The theater seemed to be swaying, then everything blurred. He shut his eyes for a minute. When he opened them, the box was beginning to fill. Half a dozen extra men had joined the party, one in navy blue, two more in khaki, adding to its merriment. Hannah was entirely absorbed in the first officer, but Mary seemed quite equal to handling the others. Blanche kept whispering in his ear, as he watched.

"That blond man with glasses on is Hannah's fiance, Captain Merrill. They didn't intend to be married until fall, but since he's in the army, they've put the wedding ahead six months, now that war is declared. Mary's going to be maid of honor. Don't you want to go up and speak to her? You said you wanted to see her!"

Introducing the Hindu to Unfertilized Eggs

Hindu eggs, or eggs without life, saved the appropriation for a poultry experiment station in India, because of the sudden recollection of a practice with which Americans are familiar. The American produces infertile eggs, not because the eggs are more holy but because unfertilized eggs keep better. W. H. Wiser, a former missionary and now a student of the New York state college of agriculture, explains the dilemma of the experiment station director because the Hindus refuse to eat either chickens or their eggs. Eating an egg would be destroying life.

The station director set aside a number of hens in a separate pen and kept the roosters away from them so the hens would lay unfertilized eggs, or eggs that would not hatch. A number of Hindu officials were invited to the station and were shown the various breeds and crossbreeds, and even the famous fighting breed, the Assels; the trap-nested birds where hens were tested for egg laying records interested the officials. But the pen which, it was explained, laid Hindu eggs amazed the group. "You see, there are no roosters in this yard," but the Hindus questioned as to how that could be. Then they were shown eggs, set under hens for weeks, that would not hatch.

Although the Hindu officials would not eat the eggs, they felt that many would be happy to do so, and at least they might have cake made with them. Anyway, Mr. Wiser says, the recollection of unfertilized eggs broke down one more superstition and the experiment station continues its work.

The clubs were organized by Mrs. R. Moffit, Helen Beck, Pauline Reynolds, assistant state club leader, and E. A. Calhoun, county agent.

The Fable of Stationary Touring

By GEORGE ADE

©, Bell Syndicate.—WNU Service.

ONCE there was a well-to-do and well-mated couple, known as Mr. and Mrs. Sangwin, living in a nifty Residence Street and always planning to hie to the far-away Show-Places. These two did a lot of Summer Traveling early every Spring. They never had been to Europe or the White Mountains or Yellowstone Park except by listening to Burton Holmes and reading Folders, yet they had a Knowledge of Geography which was a great Help when they tackled a cross-eyed Puzzle.

Probably no one in the World knew more about Beauty Spots which they had failed to visit. If they were well informed regarding Switzerland and the Golden Gate and the Piney Woods, it was because they had dreamed about them with so much regulatory. They had been all over the Map without putting a Nick in the Letter of Credit.

Next to picking out a Pearl Necklace in a Show Window and then walking rapidly up the Street, this Chautauqua Method of visiting Africa by Proxy and going to the Mediterranean by reading the Ads in the Sunday Paper, is probably the least expensive of all Dissipations.

It just seemed as if the Dandelions and the Puss-Willows and the hopping Robins, all of them Harbingers of Spring and gay Advance Agents for glorious Summer, seemed to work on the Sangwins and produce a Form of emotional Squiffles.

You could bank on it that every Vernal Equinox, about the Time for changing from Heavy to Light, Mr. Sangwin would look out on a new Crop of tender Leaflets, basking in the Sunshine, and remark, with an Air of Finality, "No two Ways about it, I'm going to arrange my Affairs so we can go Somewhere this Summer."

Everything Sitting Pretty.

"Attaboy!" the Good Wife would exclaim. She was glad to know that at last they would cut out the Stalling and take a long, dandy Trip. She had everything doped for the Get-away. Clarice could be sent to visit her Aunt Loretta in Springfield. Robert was old enough to be placed at a Summer Camp for Boys, and she had the Address of one recommended by the Higginses. The Gentleman who mowed the Lawns and manicured the Porches could be installed in the Room above the Garage as a Caretaker, and the oldest Clancy Girl could come over and give the House a good Airing every few Days.

Not to be outdone in the Matter of painful Preparations, the other Half of the Sketch would then explain how he had been organizing Things down at the Office until the Business was practically running itself. He said that He, Himself, that is to say, Mr. Sangwin, was the only One connected with the Shebang who was worth a Hoot when it came to dealing with an Emergency or facing an important Crisis, but he would have the Routine laid out so that even his Associates, with their ossified Turrets and Secondary Intelligence, could worry along or else consult him by Cable.

Everything seemed to be Sitting Pretty. Stimulated by the Coffee, and with the Ham and Eggs between them, they would build Castles in the Air which made the Equitable Building look like a Woodman's Hut. Before Mr. Sangwin left the House they would have their Tickets bought and be walking up the Gangway, bound for Europe, Romance and Adventure.

Many and many a crowded Hour did Mrs. Sangwin devote to the blissful Task of picking out the Liner on which they would plough across the Atlantic. Without ever seeing the Ocean, she came to know more about Vessels than any one on the Shipping Board ever knew. She wrote to every Company and got Bales of Printed Matter including Diagrams, indicating all of the Staterooms, Social Hall, Life Boats, Dining Saloon, Funnels, Drink Parlors, etc., etc. These had to be spread out on the Floor and she would devote happy Days to fussing over the Lay-Out and trying to decide where they would have their Steamer Chairs placed. She and Friend Husband had quite a Run-In over the Eating Arrangements. He wanted to take the Regular Meals and she wanted to go to the Ritz Carlton Restaurant because she had read in the Papers that Constance Bennet and the Marquis and Charley Schwab always had small Tables in the Cafe instead of patronizing the main Gorge.

A Couple of Obstacles.

When the Time came, they were eating Cold Snacks in their own Dining Room. You see, when they made all of their elaborate Plans for going over and turning the Eastern Hemisphere inside out, Mrs. Sangwin had overlooked the Fact that she was Corresponding Secretary of a Local Club which generated Culture and peddled the late News. It seemed that this Club was to have the Honor of entertaining the State Federation during the third week in June. The Sangwins had laid out an Itinerary and were booked for Venice June 18th. What could the poor Woman do? She had forgotten all about the impending World's Event in her own Home Town. She knew that the State Convention would be a Flop unless she was on hand to lend Grace and Dignity and Social Eclat to the Proceedings. So she up and told Hiram that she guessed Europe would have to wait because she didn't want to chase away and turn all the Arrangements over to a Bunch of Female Nit-Wits who would get everything balled up.

Hiram heaved a couple of sizable Sighs and said it was all for the best because he felt it his Duty to stick around for the Annual Tournament out at the Country Club. He had gone to the Finals in the Third Flight the Year before and then had been robbed of the Cup because he was buried in the Sand, got a Cuppy Lie, looked up on all of his Pitch Shots, suffered from Heart-Burn because the Steward should have had it analyzed, and an Angle Worm stopped his Putt. The Third Flight Championship had gone to old Mr. Dibbits, who had been a Slacker during the Civil War and had become venerable without achieving Respectability. Venice or no Venice, Mr. Sangwin wanted to be on Hand in July to trim the everlasting Daylights out of the doddering Wreck. It seemed that Mr. Dibbits had been suffering from Inflammatory Rheumatism all Winter and looked to be about Twenty minutes from a Rosewood Casket. Mr. Sangwin didn't want him to get well but he did want him to live until July and have Strength enough to get to the First Tee. He said it would be a Crime to traipse off to Europe on a mere Pleasure Jaunt when he had a Chance to keep working on his Approach, lengthen the Drive and cop the terrible $8 Piece of Silverware.

That was one Year. No Longer ago than 1926 they departed from their usual Habit of taking a Mid-Summer Journey through Europe in April and May. That Year they were all set for a Motor Tour which was to include all the Best Hotels and the Scenic Splendors of the North American Continent. Mrs. Sangwin had the Blue Book practically memorized, and Mr. Sangwin had bought his Goggles and tested the Thermos Bottles and everything seemed ipskalorious when suddenly Mrs. S. remembered that if she rode too far in a Car she would get the darndest Case of Nervous Headache, so in 1926 the inveterate travelers compromised by attending a Street Carnival pulled off by the B. P. O. E.

For several Years before that War was the Alibi. They would tell all Callers that they were just crazy to take in the Sights on the Other Side, but they were waiting for Conditions to get back to Normalcy. Not once did they ever Confess, even to Themselves, that they were scared to Death when they saw a Storm at Sea in a News Reel, and they had no real Longing to be among Foreign Barbarians who spoke strange Languages, and they were secretly in Love with the Corned Beef Hash, the Griddle Cakes and the Double Mattresses of their own comfortable Shack.

Off on a Wild Excursion.

This Year they are at it again. They are just as het up as they ever were. For several Weeks they have been standing in awed Silence in Westminster. They have supped at a famous Night Joint in Paris, where all of the Ladies were not what they might have been but, evidently, were what they seemed to be. They have looked down from dizzy Alpine Heights at the smiling Valleys. They have learned how to pronounce Salle a Manger! They have lolled back in Gondolas, looking at the Moon, and stood in the Colliseum, trying to visualize the spectacular Immensity of a Roman Holiday. They have visited Battle-Fields and purchased Souvenirs and Mrs. Sangwin has seen the big-eyed Manikins parade in their hoop-la-Fineries.

Gosh, but they have been going at some Clip since about April the first! What's more, they really and truly believe that they are going to sail on the Mastodonic just as soon as Clarice graduates from High School. If they were not so wrought up they would pause in their Pipe-Dreaming and recall that Mrs. S. has a lot of Fruit to put up this Summer and that the Chamber of Commerce has made Hiram Chairman of the Committee on Arrangements for the Celebration of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Organization of the Fire Department, the dates being July 9th, 10th and 11th. So the big Vacation will go blooey.

However, the Sangwins will not be deprived of their usual Outing. Some Day next month she will fry two Chickens and stuff some Eggs and harpoon them with Tooth-Picks and wrap them in Tissue Paper, and the whole Tribe will motor up the River as far as the old Peters Mill, where Hiram will do some Still Fishing while Mother takes a good Nap, with the Black Cushion under her Head and a Handkerchief over her Face.

MORAL: There is only one Long Trip which cannot be side-tracked.

Invented Oil Lamp

We moderns who nightly obtain our illumination from incandescent bulbs are inclined to forget that the oil lamp in its day was an important improvement over older methods of illumination. Poland, however, has not forgotten, for it is to a Pole, I. Lukasiewicz, a chemist from Lemberg, to whom they give the credit for the production of the first modern oil lamp, says the Scientific American. Poland celebrated recently the fiftieth anniversary of the death of this benefactor of mankind and the eightieth anniversary of his development of the oil lamp. According to Dr. Kazimierz Maslankiewicz, who supplied this information, Mr. Lukasiewicz also was the discoverer of means of purifying and distilling petroleum.—Detroit Free Press.

Howe About:

America
Wisdom
Thrift a Blessing

By ED HOWE

I HAVE been reading Hendrik Van Loon's new geography in which oceans seem only magnified big creeks, made in the same way as the little creeks in every neighborhood the children fish and swim in, and the county commissioners bridge. The book is devoted mainly to the physical characteristics of the world: to the good or bad luck the people of different countries drew as the mountains and rivers finally settled down, and became fit for human habitation.

"From a geographical point of view," says the writer, a foreigner, "America is almost everything that could possibly be desired, and had most luck of all."

Nothing is lacking. Climate and soil the best; the rivers, mountains and plains happened to fall into the best possible arrangement for the convenience of men. Times are hard, but so far as nature could oblige us in its huge haphazard and careless way, it did better in America than elsewhere.

So that is settled again: if we go to the devil we should at least be fair enough to admit that we had a better chance than any other people.

There are all sorts of opinions about me. O. O. McIntyre even goes so far as to say: "His publication is filled with tolerance and wisdom and not with indignation."

I'm not very indignant; I've finally discovered that whatever is happening has happened before, and was intended to happen. A good gentleman who edits the most foolish of all such publications writes: "Never does the human soul appear so strong and noble as when it foregoes revenge, and dares forgive an injury." I have no soul but I forego revenge, and forgive injuries, every day. Did I not, I should have by this time shot a good many people.

As to wisdom, there is not much of it. Such as there is is available to all, and consists in admitting human and world faults, and doing a little better with them.

* * *

What is the object of saving? Nearly always to provide for sickness, old age; to educate children; to provide the comforts of life; to build better homes, business houses, schools and roads. Can there be honest objection to any such efforts? Is not a man with savings a better and more useful citizen than his neighbor who is always a community problem? Why, then, the general disposition to criticize the frugal, thrifty man? Is not such course denial of a worthy principle we teach our children? In every mother's talk to her children she includes the importance of thrift. Life is a very serious business; we know saving is as important as industry, or politeness, or fairness, or temperance. Every useful development in the community or nation is due to men who work diligently, and save something. When parents say to a boy: "Become a good man," they mean thrift also.

Most writers claim only a few men are intelligent, but I have never been of that opinion; if men did not have a good deal of intelligence, they would walk into the fire, into the river, and be destroyed.

The great number of the race proves that men know enough, and once a man has life, it is only a question of improving it. History proves this may not only be done, but has been, from century to century; I have known many men called fools to astonish others called wise.

Intelligence is no more than the cunning exhibited by a fox: knowledge inherited and acquired from long experience. A fox, celebrated as smartest of dumb brutes, uses all the sense he has, which men will not do. If a fox encounters suspicious tracks, he doesn't stop to argue he is entitled to range that territory, but makes off; never yet has there been a fox urging that foxes and men should love each other.

We are all more idle, intemperate, unfair and impolite than we are ignorant. Nature looks after its creatures; somewhere in blood and brain there is education when it is needed; inheritance from a long line of learning.

Recently I was watching a Salvation army service on the streets, and noted that all the participants were young. One fellow in uniform was about twenty-two years old and a perfect physical specimen. Most of the women were young also, and there was little talk about religion—most of it was about putting a dollar on the drum.

* * *

When an old woman is in the company of a young and pretty girl, she is disposed to hover around the younger woman, and hear again the sweet things men once said to her.

* * *

When I visit a theater I do not care for scenes from maternity wards or other gross incidents in the story of love. . . . Later, however, motherhood is a fine sentiment, and fits well into a show. I do not know that mothers are gentler, or wiser, or more patient than ancient maidens, but there are more old mothers than old maids, and more of them to admire. I am unfaithful to my own sex to the extent that I believe that in natural goodness women average a little better than men.

Geese Did No Damage

Farmers near Clear Lake, Calif., complained last spring that migrating geese were damaging grain by clipping it short. "I wouldn't give 50 cents an acre for it," said one farmer after inspecting his field. The geese apparently did no damage, however, for when the biological survey inspector looked over the field in June, he found the grain shoulder high. The biological survey points out that the Clear Lake experience is typical, that geese nipping off grain in the spring apparently does no damage to the crop.

3 RULES
big help to BOWELS

What a joy to have the bowels move like clockwork, every day! It's easy, if you mind these simple rules of a famous old doctor:

1. Drink a big tumblerful of water before breakfast, and several times a day.
2. Get plenty of outdoor exercise without unduly fatiguing yourself.
3. Try for a bowel movement at exactly the same hour every day.

Everyone's bowels need help at times, but the thing to use is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. You'll get a thorough cleaning-out, and it won't leave your insides weak and watery. This family doctor's prescription is just fresh laxative herbs, pure pepsin, and other helpful ingredients that couldn't hurt a child. But how it wakes up those lazy bowels! How good you feel with your system rid of all that poisonous waste matter.

The Erickson & Lund Funeral Home Invites You

Extensive remodeling of the Erickson & Lund Funeral Home has now been completed, and on Friday and Saturday April 28 and 29, we invite the people of the community to come in and visit our establishment.

In our improvements to the Erickson & Lund Funeral Home, we have sought to make it a place that is proper in atmosphere and decorations for the final tribute. The Chapel combines beauty and simplicity, with all the necessary arrangements for a distinctive and sympathetic service.

You are cordially invited to come in between the hours of 2:00 in the afternoon and 10:00 in the evening on Friday and Saturday of this week to go through our Funeral Home. Favors will be distributed.

Opening Concert
and 17th of May Festival on Wednesday, May 17, 1933
Commencing at 8 o'clock p. m.
at
Holt, Minnesota

There has been arranged for this occasion a fine program of new band numbers, which the local band has not played in public before.

There will also be speeches, orchestra numbers, and songs by local talent.

Come and celebrate the 17th of May in proper fashion!

Admission: 25c and 10c

"This is not insurance"

Here is what
The Minnesota Benevolent Society
does for its members:

Pays all Doctor Bills (except as below)
Pays 75% of Doctor Bills on Rural Calls
Pays One-Half of bill in Tonsilectomy Cases
Pays $15.00 in Maternity Cases (where member has been in the Society nine months)
Pays $15.00 a week Hospital Allowance
Pays for extraction of one tooth in emergency cases
Pays up to $500.00 of bills as above, for each member, in any single case

Here is what the Society will not do:

Pay for medicine, X-ray, or first consultation without treatment.

We Are Not Wishing Anybody Any Hard Luck---

But ask yourself this question, "What would I do if I met with an accident, or became sick and had to have an operation?" It is at such times that the Society comes to the aid of its members, by paying bills as described above.

The Cost of This Service

One Dollar is paid upon entering the Society.

Fifty Cents is the limit of any donations called for.

However, since the Society was created last Summer only four 25-cent donations were requested, to pay about 200 doctor bills and 50 hospital bills. There was an exceptional amount of sickness during the winter months just passed.

The probability is that calls for donations will be less frequent during the summer months.

JOIN NOW!

You never can tell when you will get hurt or sick and need a doctor's care. At a cost of less than 1 cent a day, 20c a month, you can have this protection.

Drop in at the News office and let us explain this plan more thoroughly to you.

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

One Dollar Fifty Per Year In Advance

Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota, Friday, May 5, 1933.

Volume 23, Number 1

$72,000 Allotted to Marshall County For Use On Roads

Marshall county will receive $72,912 as its 1933 share of the state one-mill road tax and the gasoline tax. This was decided at a meeting of the State Board of Allotment in St. Paul, says a Highway Department bulletin.

From the one-mill tax, Marshall county will get $12,912, while its share of the gasoline tax will amount to $60,000 This money includes special allotment in addition to the regular allotment.

The total amount to be distributed from the State Road and Bridge fund this year will be considerably less than in 1932, owing to lower property valuations, tax delinquencies and a decreased consumption of gasoline in the state. The Board of Allotment placed the total available from the one-mill levy at $1,291,200 compared with $1,897,000 last year. The 1933 share of the counties in the gasoline tax was put at $3,600,000 by the board, as against $4,325,000 in 1932.

Members of the board of allotment are N. W. Ellsberg, commissioner of highways, Stafford King, state auditor and Julius Schmahl, state treasurer.

The law fixes the minimum allotment of gas tax funds to any county at ¼ per cent of the total amount available, while the minimum allotment to any one county from the one-mill tax is 1 per cent. The maximum allotment to any county is 3 per cent of each fund.

No Petit Jury To Be Called

No petit jury will be called for the regular spring term of district court for Marshall county which was scheduled to open in Warren Monday morning, according to an order issued by Julius J. Olson, district court judge, early last week, states the Sheaf.

This order was issued following the listing of only nine civil cases for the calendar with A. C. Swandby, clerk of court, attorneys in all cases agreeing to continue the jury cases until the fall term.

Taxpayers of the county will be saved approximately $700 through the order of Judge Olson, said Mr. Swandby, in commenting on the action. Last May, the jury costs for the county totalled approximately $650, and if the jury had been called into session this week the cost would have been approximately the same. Jurors are paid $4.00 while attending the session of court, which will total $120 for the jury alone. Then in addition to the jurors salaries, court baliffs, extra assistants and court supplies must be added to the cost for each session.

"All attorneys have consented to the end that the expense of having a jury at the May term can be avoided," Judge Olson declared in his order filed with Mr. Swandby.

The annual May term of court went through the formality of opening on Monday morning, at which time W. O. Braggans, president of the 14th Judicial District Bar association presented a large picture of the late Judge, the Honorable Andrew Grindeland, to the Marshall county bar association. The picture was hung on the walls in the court room at the court house in memory of the departed jurist. Acceptance of the picture was made in behalf of the county association by Judge Bernard B. Brett.

Feed Variety Important

Variety in the dairy ration is very important. If an animal in good health loses its appetite, the ration usually lacks variety. When several concentrates are included in the ration, there is less danger of a lack of any certain kind of protein or mineral matter than when a smaller number is used. Two kinds of roughage, one a succulent feed and the other a good legume hay, are desirable.

We studied the picture "The Hilltop" by Jean MacLane in Art class on Monday. Afterwards we blew bubbles to help us remember the picture.

The beginners are going to get pre-primer readers this week. Most of us have mastered the color words besides several phrases.

Tuberculin re-test of Marshall county cattle started Monday. G. A. Sustad of Viking is in charge of the work. Dr. Twete of Thief River is doing the testing around here.

Road Extension Bill To Make County Saving

In addition to the all-important ditch tax relief bill, Marshall county was given much benefit by the Minnesota state legislature in bills passed during the past session, many measures directly effecting Marshall county interests.

Chiefly among the new bills is the extension of the Trunk highway system which definitely includes two routes in Marshall county, while approval was also given this county along with ten other counties to use 50 per cent of the gas tax money allotment for the retirement of road and bridge bonds.

New trunk highways for Marshall county included in the 4,000 mile extension adopted by the legislature include the taking over of State Aid Road A between Warren and Oslo and the construction of a new road along the Soo Line railroad from Thief River Falls to Karlstad through Newfolden and Strandquist. This latter road is part of an extension between Erskine and Noyes, to be located along the Soo railway.

When the state highway department takes over this new extension this year, Marshall county will be saved approximately $4,500 a year on maintenance costs, this figure also includes a supposed temporary route for the new Soo line road, according to figures compiled in the office of H. T. Swanson, county highway engineer.

State Aid Road A between Warren and Oslo cost the county $2,273 to maintain during 1932, this figure including snow removal and regular maintenance. This expense will be borne by the state highway department as soon as the new law goes into effect.

Although no definite information has been received from the state highway department officials regarding the Soo Line highway extension, if the route is to be maintained this year, travel would undoubtedly travel north of Thief River Falls on No. 32 to Road B, and then west on B through Newfolden, then North on Road J, thru Strandquist and on into Kittson county. The 12 miles of highway on Road B cost the county $1,428 to maintain last year and the 13 miles on Road J cost $819 for last year's maintenance. This expense would be maintained by the state under the new proposal.

Another route affecting this section of the state is a continuation of Trunk Highway No. 11 from Donaldson west to Drayton; a new road from Roseau to Bemidji which would touch the east border of Marshall county; a road following the G. N. from Crookston to Herdrum, a road connecting Ada and Barnesville and a new road from Thief River Falls to Tower up on the Iron Range.

Permission to use one-half of the gas tax allotment for this county to retire road and bridge bonds falling due can also be used to good advantage.—Sheaf.

United States Goes Off the Gold Standard and Moves Toward Inflation—Secretary Perkins Asks Federal Control of Industry.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

President Roosevelt

"WE ARE off the gold standard," was the terse but momentous announcement by Secretary of the Treasury Woodin as he returned to his office from a conference with President Roosevelt; and at the same time the White House gave out the news that the Chief Executive had placed an embargo on the further export of gold, permitting the dollar to depreciate in foreign exchange, and was ready to ask congress for authority to put into action his policy of "controlled inflation." Mr. Roosevelt himself calls this policy a program for control of commodity price levels and says it is designed to raise prices but to keep them from going too far up. He gave assurance that there would be no resort to "printing press money."

Senators Thomas, Byrnes and Pittman drafted the measure to carry out the President's plan, and it was promptly introduced in the senate as an amendment to the pending farm relief bill. It provides:

1. For expansion of credit up to $3,000,000,000 through purchase of government obligations by the federal reserve banks. (This means the purchase in the open market of government bonds and was tried in the Hoover administration.)
2. As an alternative, for the inflation of the currency by issuance of greenbacks up to $3,000,000,000 under the act of 1862, such currency to be legal tender for all debts, public and private.
3. For use of such greenbacks to meet maturing government obligations and to purchase government obligations.
4. For retirement of such greenbacks at the rate of 4 per cent a year.
5. For reduction of the gold content of the dollar not more than 50 per cent for the purpose of protecting American foreign trade from the effects of depreciated foreign currencies and to enable the President to negotiate an international agreement stabilizing monetary standards.
6. For acceptance of war debt payments up to an aggregate of $100,000,000 in silver at a value of not more than 50 cents an ounce.
7. For coinage of such silver and deposit in the treasury for redemption of silver certificates issued against it, such certificates to be used for paying obligations of the United States.

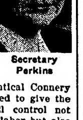
Secretary Woodin drew up the order concerning gold exportation. Under it no gold is allowed to leave the country except that earmarked for foreign account before April 15 and such amounts as are required to save American business men from loss on commitments in foreign trade incurred prior to the proclamation of the new policy.

The United States thus has placed itself on the same footing as Great Britain and many other foreign nations. Its money is unstable in value in international trade. It was pointed out that Mr. Roosevelt could now with greater propriety propose that all nations go back to the gold standard together.

Effects of our plunge into the inflation pool were immediate. Prices on the stock exchanges and especially in the commodity markets went up with a rush and trading was heavier than for many months. Millions of dollars were added to the farm value of all grains, and cotton and sugar also moved upward, as did provisions.

On the London and Paris exchanges the dollar sank decidedly. Neither the British nor the French were pleased with the President's action. The London Daily Telegraph said: "Following America's latest action a demand will arise in every country for fresh depreciation so that exporters may not lose their power of competition in world markets. The new task of the statesmen is to prevent a chaotic process of competitive depreciation of currencies."

POLICIES of the Roosevelt administration are being expanded and extended so fast and so far that congress and the country are scarcely able to keep up with the pace set. One of the broadest and most revolutionary of its proposals was submitted to the house committee on labor by Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins in the form of a draft bill offered as a substitute for Senator Black's 30-hour week measure which was passed by the senate and for the almost identical Connery house bill. It is designed to give the federal government full control not only over the hours of labor but also over industrial production and prices. The passage of this legislation and of the pending farm marketing bill would make Secretaries Perkins and Wallace virtual dictators over the economic life of the nation.



Secretary Perkins

The legal basis of the labor bill is to be found in the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution and in the "unfair competition" sections of the federal trade act.

It is upon these legal powers that the secretary of labor is to depend to exercise the following authority:

1. To prohibit from interstate commerce articles produced by any industry working its labor more than 30 hours a week or more than six hours in any one day. Milk and cream are exempted; executives and managers are exempted; and certain exemptions are made in the cases of seasonal or other emergencies. Boards are set up to regulate such exemptions.
2. To limit and if necessary prohibit from interstate commerce the production of any plant or industrial group which is overproducing.
3. To investigate wages through a wage board, to fix and impose minimum fair wages; to publish the names of employers failing to raise wages in accordance with a direct order to do so; and to prohibit from interstate commerce goods produced by any employer refusing to comply with a wage order.

RIGHT now the eyes of the world are turned on Washington, for the series of talks between President Roosevelt and representatives of many other nations have begun, and if the hopes of the Chief Executive are realized they will result in the finding of a way out of the world depression.

Prime Minister J. Ramsay MacDonald was the first of the visitors to arrive and the first to confer with Mr. Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull. Edouard Herriot, former premier of France, was close on MacDonald's heels, and the others are scheduled to follow rapidly. No one of the "conversationalists" is empowered to really decide anything, but all of them are free to express the views of their respective governments on economic matters. It was understood that MacDonald would not talk much about the war debts, but Herriot was authorized to state France's position on that subject.

The whole series of conversations in Washington is a preliminary to the coming world economic conference, and the hope of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull is that the way can be paved for rehabilitation of the world by the lowering of trade barriers and monetary stabilization. They will gladly abandon America's traditional high tariff policy if the other nations are willing to co-operate and reciprocate.

REPUBLICAN postmasters who have demonstrated their efficiency are to be permitted to complete their terms. So announces Postmaster General James A. Farley, to the joy of several thousand G. O. P. office holders and the corresponding dismay of a great army of Democrats who would like the jobs. Mr. Farley says his party has long stood for the civil service system of competitive examinations and "will not abandon that high ground," so he gives out this message:

J. A. Farley

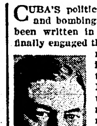
"No incumbent whose term has not yet expired and who has been rendering loyal and efficient service to the government need have the slightest fear of removal. It will be the policy of the Post Office department to allow every efficient postmaster to fill out his term."

District attorneys, marshals and collectors are not under civil service and in time these places probably will be filled with deserving Democrats. Also there are hundreds of vacancies in the postmasterships to be filled immediately, and these will be filled as soon as Mr. Farley's department has completed a study of examination methods.

The postmaster general makes the welcome assertion that the United States post office is going to pay its way hereafter. He aims to save $72,000,000 in the coming fiscal year, and this, he believes, will suffice to balance the postal budget.

JAPAN'S armies in China continued their advance south of the great wall, driving before them disorganized or traitorous Chinese troops. The Japanese at latest reports had occupied the entire triangle between the wall and the Lwan river, with its base on the gulf of Pohai, and were moving onward toward Tientsin. They crossed the river near Lwanchow and bombarded that city and the surrounding region. There was great alarm in Tientsin, where some 400 Americans, mostly business men and their families, reside.

When the Japanese started their push into the undisputed Chinese territory south of the great wall the Lwan river was set as the limit. But the Japanese command now has announced that they will continue the pursuit as far as the Chinese continue to set up defenses. The Japanese authorities deny, however, that they intend to occupy Peiping and Tientsin. Their apparent plan is to create a buffer area out of the triangle to facilitate the consolidation of the newly conquered province of Jehol. They have gained control of all the important passes through the great wall on the southern border of Jehol and the gates have been sealed and heavy guards placed at them.



Rep. Fish

CUBA'S political disorders, murders and bombings, of which much has been written in recent months, have finally engaged the attention of the administration in Washington. Representative Hamilton Fish of New York has been urging our government to employ diplomatic intervention to end the "reign of terror," and said he would formally demand that Secretary Hull take such a step unless the administration got busy very speedily. For a time Mr. Hull seemed averse to any interference, but Mr. Roosevelt started things by calling the Cuban ambassador, Don Oscar B. Cintas, to the White House for a discussion of the situation. The ambassador also conferred with Sumner Welles, assistant secretary of state, and then Mr. Welles went to the White House for instructions.

Mr. Roosevelt has no desire to order military intervention in the affairs of Cuba, which he could do under the Platt amendment, holding that this would cost us a lot of money and besides would enrage President Machado and create an unpleasant diplomatic situation. Therefore his present plan is to take steps to redeem the island's financial situation, which is wretched, and to relieve the unemployment and discontent that are at the bottom of Cuba's difficulties. He and the State department wish to increase the sugar imports from Cuba by granting substantial reductions to the island on the sugar tariff. This, naturally, will not please the domestic cane and beet sugar industries, whose representatives are nervously watching developments.

There is a genuine fear among some officials in Washington that opponents to President Machado will, in their efforts to overthrow his regime, perpetrate some outrage against American interests in Cuba, thus raising a situation in which the United States might be compelled to intervene.

AMBASSADOR JOSEPHUS DANIELS reached Mexico City under heavy military guard and after one attempt was made to wreck his train. Immediately after his arrival in the capital the unofficial critics there of his appointment let it be known that they had had a change of heart and no longer were hostile. Mr. Daniels was formally received by Foreign Minister Casaurane, with whom he had a long and pleasant chat, and later presented his credentials to President Rodriguez.

"Mr. Daniels made a magnificent impression on me," Casaurane said. "While it was simply a courtesy call, we had a very agreeable chat, discussing topics of general interest in economic, educational, and social fields."

"I had a very interesting and delightful visit," Mr. Daniels said. "The foreign minister was very gracious. I propose to avail myself of his hospitality often."

MOSCOW'S famous trial of six British engineers and eleven Russians on charges of espionage, sabotage and bribery ended in the conviction of five of the Britons and ten of the Russians. L. C. Thornton was sentenced to three years in prison; W. H. MacDonald, who pleaded guilty, to two years; Allan Monkhouse, John Cushny and Charles Nordwall were ordered deported; A. W. Gregory was acquitted. The ten Russians were given prison terms up to ten years. There was nothing surprising in the outcome unless it were the mildness of the penalties inflicted.

The British government, which had been watching the case with intense interest, struck back at the Soviet union promptly. King George and the privy council declared an 80 per cent embargo on Russian imports and the Metropolitan Vickers Electrical Equipment company, employer of the convicted men, ordered an immediate appeal in behalf of the two defendants who were sent to prison.

MYRON C. TAYLOR, chairman of the United States Steel corporation, has added his voice to the chorus of industrial executives who believe the course of the depression has turned. At the annual meeting of stockholders in Hoboken, Mr. Taylor, who is noted in the financial district for the cautiousness of his utterances, declared:

"Better times are ahead."

M. C. Taylor

And in support of this belief he cited the fact that the corporation was operating at 21 per cent of capacity, the first time that operations have reached this level since March, 1932.

Following his address Mr. Taylor presented to the meeting a motion by a stockholder for a vote of confidence in the Roosevelt administration. It was carried without dissent by a standing vote.

RUTH BRYAN OWEN, the new minister to Denmark and the first American woman to be given such a diplomatic post, has told the newspaper men that she intends to serve beer in the legation in Copenhagen, which is something for the daughter of William Jennings Bryan, lifelong advocate of prohibition.

"Yes," she said, "I will serve 3.2 per cent beer. It is in keeping with the law of my own country and the custom of the land to which I am going. But I don't consider that important. I am really interested in the progressive development in Denmark which I hope to study for my country."

With the Minnesota Lawmakers

Latest News of the Work of the State Legislature Condensed for the Busy Reader

The forty-eighth Minnesota legislature passed into history April 19 after solons battled through the last 27 hours in a non-stop session. The final law-passing session, starting at 9 a. m. Tuesday and running through the day and night and until noon Wednesday, was the longest and one of the wildest in the history of the state. One hundred and ninety-six tired and worn out legislators departed for their various homes throughout the state. Governor Olson had three days in which to accept or reject laws passed.

The highest state tax levy in the history of Minnesota was approved in the closing hours of its session. By legislative action the state auditor was authorizied to set a maximum levy of 10.98 mills for 1934, and of 10.88 mills for 1935. Should revenues from other sources prove to be greater than now is anticipated, the auditor would have power to set a lower rate, but under no circumstances may the rate exceed the established maximums. These new rates are to bring into the state treasury a total of $37,154,339 for the biennium, as compared to $43,173,320 appropriated by the 1931 legislature. The increased rate in the face of reduced appropriations, State Auditor Stafford King explained, is due to a slump in assessed valuations. According to Auditor King, the amount of money that has to be raised by taxation of general property is 17,204,749. Of this amount $8,651,359 will be for the fiscal year of 1934, and the balance for the fiscal year of 1935. To realize these amounts, Auditor King said, a levy of 5.8 mills will be required for the general revenue fund for 1934, and of 5.7 mills for 1935. The difference between these millage rates and the total levy is made up by fixed statutory levies for a variety of purposes, such as the University of Minneosta building fund, the state road and bridge levy, national guard armories and others. In addition to these property tax levies, the state has income sources in levies on iron ore tonnages and on gross earnings of railroads and telephone companies, and other special taxes. Should these special taxes bring in amounts exceeding those used by the legislature in making its computations, the state auditor then would be in a position to fix a levy below the maximums established.

In making the computations on which the new tax levy was based, the state auditor's office compiled a table showing the tentative appropriatons made by the legislature for state activities the next two years, as compared to the appropriations made in 1931 for the present biennium.

Following is the table:

Purpose	1933	1931
State Department	$6,766,035	$8,151,780
Board control	8,405,050	10,889,833
Educational	19,652,584	21,335,489
Semi-state	1,568,200	2,116,725
Misc. claims	60,000	42,680
Soldiers' bonus	25,528	28,810
Board of Health	48,100	——
Print amendments	26,750	17,000
Legis. expense	150,000	275,000
Draught aid	25,000	——
Chicago Fair	15,000	——
Compensation	32,000	——
Store tax adm.	20,000	——
Aid to Lake of the Woods and Koochiching counties	45,000	——
Rural credit land tax to school districts	200,000	——
Board of control for relief administration	51,000	——
Telephone system	55,000	——
Income tax administration	47,000	——
Land economics surveys	10,000	——
Totals	$37,202,349	$43,173,320

Auditor King estimated that other levies in addition to the general revenue fund levy will be 5.18 mills for both years of the biennium. This includes an estimated levy of 1.25 mills for rural credit obligations.

A bill enabling the state to take advantages for improving its forests with federal funds was passed. It establishes a number of state forests. The locations of the forests, under provisions of the bill, are: Beltrami island, Lake of the Woods county; Cloquet valley, St. Louis county; Finland, Lake county; Fond du Lac, Carleton county; Foot hills, Cass county; George Washington Memorial, St. Louis county; Grand Portage, Cook county; Kabetogama, St. Louis county; Land of Lakes, Cass county; Pine Island, Koochiching county; Savanna, Aitkin county; Third river, Itasca county, and White Earth, Clearwater county.

Among the measures that were given approval of both houses was one that adds more than 4,000 miles of roads and city streets to the state trunk highway system. These roads are now financed by the counties.

The governor's unemployment insurance bill was refused a hearing during the last session and it died without any action being taken.

Big game hunters who favored a 5-day open season this year as recommended by W. D. Stewart got no encouragement from the senate. The bill was killed.

Below is a list of major bills passed by the 1933 legislature:

State income tax, requiring single persons with incomes over $1,200 a year and married persons or heads of families with incomes of over $2,000 to pay a tax after making permissible deductions.

Constitutional amendment for a state income tax to be voted upon next year.

Fixed appropriations for state departments and activities, the University of Minnesota and semistate undertakings to be expanded during the biennium beginning July 1, 1933.

Fixed the maximum tax levies for each of the two years beginning July 1, 1933.

A tax on retail stores, levying new taxes against retailers having two or more stores.

A 20 to 50 per cent cut in automobile license fees effective this year and next.

Three measures relating to trucks—one placing common and contract carrier trucks under jurisdiction of the railroad and warehouse commission, another setting new high tax rates and the third limiting their size as a highway safety order.

Moratoriums on real estate and personal property mortgages and contracts for deed.

Extending the time for paying delinquent real estate taxes and reducing the delinquency penalties.

Twin Cities sewage disposal measure, requiring Minneapolis and St. Paul to build a $16,000,000 plant for treatment of wastes before dumping them into the Mississippi river.

Liquidation of the rural credits bureau, found by investigation to be losing $3,000,000.

Reapportionment of the state into nine congressional districts.

Adding approximately 4,000 miles of city streets and county roads to the state trunk highway system.

A 54-hour week for women in industry.

State-wide boxing under direction of a five-man commission.

Permitting use of 50 per cent of gas tax revenue to pay road and bridge bonds in counties more than 40 per cent tax delinquent.

Permitting counties to issue bonds for poor relief subject to the governor's approval.

Permitting cities of the first class to levy a three mill tax regardless of existing limitations for poor relief.

The anti-injunction bill sponsored by labor.

Consolidation of the primary ballot.

A cut of 50 per cent in the penalties for delinquency in paying auto license taxes.

Establishment of machinery to permit counties to merge.

Permitting the state to exchange state lands for those federally owned.

Postponing until 1935 penalties on 1931 real estate taxes.

Bills Killed.

Repeal of Brooks-Coleman act giving jurisdiction over street railways to railroad and warehouse commission.

Grading and weighing of livestock at concentration points under state supervision similar to that of South St. Paul.

Retail sales tax.

Increasing railroad and telephone companies' gross earnings taxes to 8 per cent.

Legislative ratification of the national child labor amendment.

Permitting horse racing and pari mutuel betting.

Restoratou of capital punishment.

Requiring telephone companies to pay costs of rate investigation.

Authorizing a $50,000,000 state bond issue to finance state entry into the electric power business.

Authorizing the state department of agriculture to fix minimum prices on basic agricultural products sold in the state.

Placing milk producers under state regulation along the lines that public utilities are now regulated to fix prices.

Requiring gasoline companies to add 10 per cent of alcohol made from Minnesota grains to gaseline.

News of Minnesota

EVENTS of the week throughout the "State of Ten Thousand Lakes" told in brief form

Olivia—Plans are under way for a community day May 15.

Minneapolis—Two were killed in auto accidents Easter Sunday.

St. Clair—Thieves took 2,200 gallons of gasoline from the milk station here.

Brainerd—Forest rangers directed a force of 100 men in controlling brush fires in this area.

Fairfax—Fire caused by the explosion of a gasoline stove destroyed a coffee shop adjoining the Windsor hotel here.

Minneapolis—A usual two-months' supply of pretzels were consumed in the week following the legalization of beer here.

St. Paul—Work on incompleted 1932 state highway constructian projects will begin in 23 Minnesota counties about May 1.

Warren—Retest of cattle in Marshall county for tuberculosis, which was to have started early this month, will begin May 1.

Blooming Prairie—Butter produced from the creamery here is reported to be served on the tables of the White House in Washington.

Glenwood—By an almost unanimous vote, Glenwood citizens approved construction of a new disposal plant at a cost of $38,000 to be financed by a bond issue.

Aitkin—Seven cows perished in a barn fire on the Mrs. Ratchel Young farm two miles from Aitkin, fifth barn burned in this locality in less than two years.

St. Paul—The 3,864 manufacturing establishments in the state employed 80,753 wage earners, paid out $92,928,821 in wages and produced $719,064,100 in goods during 1931.

Faribault—Thieves who expected to make a haul of the day's receipts left the local brewery's offices empty handed after ransacking the place and imprisoning a passerby.

Danube—The first band concert of the season was given here by the combined junior and senior bands of the village, assisted by a mixed chorus of Bird Island public schools.

St. Paul—Mike Holm, secretary of state, reports that owing to the rush to get new plates, refunds on licenses already purchased before the cut will not be mailed out before the last of May.

St. Paul—Condition of winter wheat in Minnesota on April 1 was 70 per cent of normal, compared with 84 per cent a year ago, Paul H. Kirk, federal agricultural statistician for Minnesota, reported.

Benson—Swift county has its first woman probate judge. She is Mrs. Marion E. Hollenbeck, appointed to fill the unexpired term of her husband, G. M. Hollenbeck, who resigned to enter private practice.

Waseca—American elm trees will be planted along the Clear Lake drive, in Clear Lake park and on the north side of the trunk highway running to Janesville in a civic improvement project by the Waseca Community Club.

Cold Springs—Burglars blasted open a safe in the Cold Springs Brewing Company office here, and escaped with $10,000 in salable securities, a valuable coin collection, an undetermined amount of cash, $750 in revenue stamps and between $750,000 and $1,000,000 in non-negotiable bonds. All of the loot except the cash and revenue stamps were found two days later in a creek near Anoka.

Henderson—Henderson celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the founding its fire depatrment. A crowd of 4,000 persons from a dozen towns in the Minnesota valley thronged the streets of the community watching a parade. Represented at the celebration were Le Sueur, Le Sueur Center, New Prague, Montgomery, St. Peter, Kasota, Belle Plaine, New Germany, Gaylord, Jordan and Mankato.

St. Paul—Fifteen forest conservation camp locations in the Superior and Chippewa national forests received approval of President Roosevelt. The sites, 11 of them in the Superior park and the remainder in the Chippewa forest, were among a group of 57 to receive sanction of the President, bringing the total number of locations decided upon to 107. In Superior park recruits will make their headquarters at Halway, Geoka, Wanless, Cascade, Gunflint, Northern Light, Caribau, Spring Creek, Portage River, Cold Springs and Sawbill, and in the Chippewa, at Cass lake, Bona, Cutfoot and Winnibigoshish.

Thief River Falls—Meeting with Pennington county board of commissioners, more than 100 farmers urged construction and care of side roads. Snow and poor drying weather have made roads almost impassable in some places.

St. Paul—Ray Robinson arrested in Canada and who confessed his part in the kidnaping last June of Haskell Bohn, son of Gebhard C. Bohn, St. Paul refrigerator manufacturer, was sentenced to serve 25 years in Stillwater penitentiary in Ramsey county district court.

MAN, GODLIKE MAN! AND HIS TROUSERS

Study of Most Important Item of Masculine Attire.

Trousers are an essential part of the man's attire, since to appear in public without them is contrary to law. Trousers consist of a central trunk from which extend two branches known respectively as the right and left leg. Entrance to the legs is gained through the trunk.

Other important parts of the trousers are the seat, which is readily identified by the shine; the waistline, which serves as a sort of equator, and the cuffs which represent the poles. The cuffs act as pockets in which may be carried gravel, mud, small lumps of coal and similar ballast.

When the wearer is in a sitting posture the trousers may be so placed as to form a lap. A trouser lap, however, is rather more ornamental than useful and compares unfavorably with a skirt lap.

To be really distinguished, trousers should exhibit an unbroken line or crease from the equator to the pole. The crease is preserved by yanking up the trousers until the socks, garters and the lower extremity of the bare calf are exposed. Thus bagginess at the knees denotes either forgetfulness or modesty on the part of the wearer.

Vital statistics compiled by competent actuaries prove that the life of the trousers is exactly half that of the coat and vest. Consequently the custom is growing to hold one pair of trousers in reserve while the other pair goes into action. That the work of each pair should be evenly divided and no discrimination shown, all that remains to perfect the system is to equip each pair of trousers with a time clock.

The value of trousers is evident if one considers the confusion that would ensue should they cease to be generally worn. For in that case how would it be possible to distinguish an ordinary business man hurrying to catch a bus from a cross-country runner out to establish a record?—Baltimore Evening Sun.

Lady Blanche Farm

A Romance of the Commonplace

By Frances Parkinson Keyes

—13—

"I can see her all right from here."

"Well, speak to her then!"

"I'd have a fat chance of saying anything there now, wouldn't I?"

"Well, don't have one of your 'grouches' about it—"

Philip hastened to interrupt the exchange of fraternal compliments that seemed imminent. The following morning, immediately after lunch, Paul left Blanche's apartment and betook himself into town. Eventually he alighted from the street car, to find himself in front of a florist's window. He hesitated a moment, then entered the shop.

"I want some flowers," he said, a little vaguely, "something pretty. For—for a lady."

"Certainly, sir. Orchids, two dollars apiece? American Beauties, fifteen a dozen? Or gilt baskets, filled with white lilacs—just in—are very attractive. Twenty dollars for the smaller size, thirty for the larger ones."

Comparative wealth in Hamstead meant actual poverty in New York, Paul had discovered. In Boston, it meant, apparently, straitened circumstances at best. He fingered the slim wallet in his pocket nervously.

"Not any—nothing like those, I'm afraid. You haven't anything like—like what grows in a country garden, have you?"

"A few sweet-peas, you mean or pansies?"

"Yes, and mignonette, and forget-me-nots."

"I could make you up an old-fashioned nosegay—"

"Yes, that's what I want."

When Paul took out his wallet to pay for the bouquet, he took out a little box, too, and writing on it in pencil in his curiously unformed and immature hand, "For Mary, with Paul's love," he slipped it in among the flowers which the salesman handed him. Then, thus armed, he turned toward Beacon street.

His destination proved to be an enormous corner house of brown stone, on the water side. Its appearance instantly suggested age, wealth and exclusiveness. Paul, uncomfortable enough already, became decidedly more so as he rang the front-door bell. The appearance of the man-servant who answered the ring did not reassure him.

"Miss Manning is not at home, sir."

"Or Mrs. Adams? Or Miss Adams?"

"None of the ladies are in, sir."

"Could I wait? I want very much to see Miss Manning."

The butler seemed to hesitate.

"I'm her cousin, Paul Manning, from Vermont. I've—I've come a long way—"

How silly that he should be pleading with this wooden-faced automaton! He half regretted the words before they were out of his mouth. But, as usual, he stood his ground. And he was rewarded.

"I think Miss Manning would wish you to wait, sir. Will you come to the library? I'll tell her you're here, directly she gets in, sir—or Miss Adams, if she comes first, sir."

The library proved to be an enormous bay-windowed room at the rear of the house, overlooking the Charles river, lined with books to the ceiling and furnished in Cordova leather. Paul had never seen, hardly even imagined, such a room before. This was the kind of house—for Mr. Hamlin's, he felt sure, would be very like his sister's—that Mary could live in forever if she chose! Mary, whose chance for "advantages" had been no better than his! Mary, whom he had called a prude and a shrew and a jailor! . . . The clock on the mantel chimed and struck half past four. The butler reappeared and piled fresh wood on the fire.

"I doubt if Miss Manning will be in now, before tea-time, sir. Is there anything I could get you, sir? Some cigarettes, or a whisky and soda?"

"No, thank you."

The fire crackled a little with the new wood, blazed into brilliant colors and settled to a steady flame. The clock chimed and struck, and struck and chimed again. It was after five when he finally heard Mary's voice.

"Someone waiting to see me? Who is it, Judkins?"

"The gentleman said he was your cousin, miss. I took him into the library."

There was a short silence.

"Thank you, Judkins."

"Shall I serve tea for you there, now miss?"

"Please."

So they were to be alone—what he had hoped for so much! He heard her coming, lightly and quickly, up the stairs. Then she entered the room.

She was dressed in the dull blue color that she had always loved, a soft, flowing gown, a large drooping hat. These were not the kind, Paul instinctively knew, that were hurriedly stitched together after the children were in bed at night, or painfully created by Miss Sims, the village dressmaker, from a "paper pattern." But the change in her was far greater than in apparel alone. He could see that now, even more clearly than at the theater the evening before. She was rested, she was happy, all of her gravity seemed to have left her. Paul had never seen a woman so beautiful, so vital, so full of promise.

"Paul! When did you come? I'm ever so glad to see you!"

"Just yesterday. I'm staying with Blanche."

"How nice! Isn't her apartment pretty? And isn't Philip—well, just almost too good to be true?"

"Yes. I guess he is true, though. Blanche is lucky."

Mary sat down, pulled off her white gloves and took off her hat.

"Is everything all right at Lady Blanche farm? Of course, or you wouldn't be here! Are you going to stay long?"

"Only a few days."

"We must try and make them pleasant for you. Hannah is giving a dinner for me tomorrow—I'm sure she'll want you to come. And there are several good plays in town—"

"It's awfully kind of you. But I'd honestly rather not be asked to dinner. I—I came just for—for rather a special reason."

"Yes?" said Mary, still lightly.

"I'm going to enlist."

Mary, pouring tea, did not answer.

"I've—I've had a devil of a row with mother."

Mary handed him the cup. "You would, of course," she said quietly.

"Do you think I did wrong?"

"No—I don't think so. Tell me more about it."

"She's all right, physically, though she insists she's a nervous invalid. And she's all right financially, too, if she'll only be careful. We were in debt, rather, after Blanche's wedding, but I've paid that all up. I've used some capital of my own. Now she can keep Hod and Myra to work for her and have plenty of money left over for food and clothing and taxes and everything that I can think of—I've been over it all pretty carefully. I've told her she could have my share of our income, too, as long as I was gone. That's fair, isn't it, Mary?"

"I should think it was—perfectly fair. What branch of the service do you want to enter?"

"The marines. If they can't get into a scrap on sea, perhaps they will on land."

"Yes—I suppose Cousin Violet, when she saw she couldn't stop your going, advised the quartermaster's department or something like that?"

"How did you guess? I felt there were lots of other men who could go into that, men with families, I mean, or who weren't all right physically. There's nothing the matter with my heart; I found that out from David Noble before he left. It was David who first put the idea of going to war into my head. I've had plenty of time to think it over since, and I'm sure I'm doing the best thing. But I'm sorry to have quarreled with mother. Cousin Jane took her side, too, and your father. No one seems to know there is a war, in Hamstead, hardly. I tried to make them see how I felt. I couldn't. I'd made up my mind to go, anyhow, but I hated going like that."

"Yes," said Mary. "It must have been hard. And I'm—I'm sorry, Paul."

"Sorry I'm going?"

"Oh, no. I'm glad you're going. I'm only sorry they couldn't see that you were right to go and that it made your going harder. I suppose it is hard enough, anyway."

Paul put down his cup and came and sat down beside her on the sofa. "Mary," he said, his voice trembling a little, "I haven't any right to ask, of course, but would you tell me?—Are you going to marry Mr. Hamlin?"

"No. I'm going home, very soon now. I'll try to make them see your side, in Hamstead. I don't know whether I can, but I'll try. And that there is a war. And that they must wake up and help to win it, if they don't want to perish in it."

"Would—would you marry me?"

For a minute the girl did not answer. She sat looking into the fire and in spite of its bright reflection, Paul thought that some of the lovely color had suddenly left her face.

"I—I thought," he went on, taking courage at not being instantly repulsed, "that if you would—we could have just a week or so together before I enlist. We could go to some quiet little place by the sea—neither of us has ever done that. And while I am gone, I could—I could remember it—and look forward to coming back to you, that way, again."

Suddenly he knelt down, and half-buried his face in the soft folds of her dress. "Mary—I've been so lonely without you all winter. I've wanted to talk to you—about New York, and the farm and the war—about everything I was interested in and thinking over myself. I've wanted to try to make some things easier and pleasanter for you. I never knew before that home, to me, meant—just you. Mary—I want you so—"

"I know," she said slowly. "I've known that, of course, since Christmas. That's why I went away. Because—you don't love me." She drew away from him a little. "You think love is just that—'wanting,'" she said. "Wanting something you can't get. And throwing it away as worthless as soon as you've got it. If I married you, you would be happy that week. But the first little French peasant you met—"

"Mary!"

"Well, wouldn't you? Or at any rate, have I any reason to suppose—to know—that you wouldn't? You don't know what it means to love."

"I thought I did. But perhaps I don't—will you tell me?"

Mary hesitated. "I don't know that I can put it into words very well," she said at last. "It isn't something you talk about. It's something you feel—that you are. And I can only tell what it means—for a girl. I can't, of course, for a man. Perhaps they don't feel as much as we do, though they always say they feel more—"

She turned her head away for a minute, and then faced him. "I can't pretend I wouldn't like to live like this always," she said. "I love the country but I haven't any illusions about it. I know that Lady Blanche farm—or any farm—means lots of hard work, lots of loneliness, lots of deprivation. I'd like to have a big, beautiful house in the city, and the constant association with delightful people—and all the rest of it. And when a man whom you like very much, offers them all to you, and you realize that you could not only have everything you want yourself, but give your father rest and comfort in his old age, and your brothers a good education, and—and—you hesitate. You can't help it. It is an awful temptation. Of course Gale Hamlin is too tactful, and too—too square, to try to bribe me. But it amounts to a bribe just the same. So I've tried to love him, so that I—I could have all this. I thought I could, perhaps. But I can't."

Mary glanced down at Paul, her lips quivering a little. He was still on his knees before her, his eyes looking up into hers, more steadily, this time, than she could look at him.

"Because," she went on, and her voice was very low, "you feel when you love a man that it doesn't matter if he's so poor he hasn't a shirt to his back, or so bad that you've got to drag him out of the gutter, if you can only belong to him. That you'd rather bake his bread, and sweep his room, and wash his clothes, than sit on a throne of gold, beside anyone else. That you want to share his poverty and his troubles and make them easier if you can. That you want to turn to him in your own sorrow and in your own joy. That you want to marry him—to go to sleep every night in his arms, and the first thing when you wake every morning, to feel his lips on yours, kissing you before you begin your day's work together. That you hope, in time, he'll be your children's father."

Paul rose from his knees and walked blindly over towards the bay window. When he finally came back, his fresh young face looked white and old.

"You didn't care for Gale Hamlin like that," he said, as if he were scourging himself with every word he spoke, "so you wouldn't marry him. You didn't want a man just because he was rich and famous and good. And you didn't want just the easy, pleasant things, like Blanche. You wanted the hard part, too. That's—that's the way you cared for me."

"Yes," said Mary, unsteadily.

"And you don't any more."

It was not a question. Nevertheless, Mary answered it with one.

"Do you think it likely?" she asked.

Paul bowed his head. "No," he said, "I don't think it's likely. Of course I know it's impossible. It was insane of me to think for one minute that you could marry me now, after what I did to you, when you cared like that. I ask your forgiveness from the bottom of my heart, but I know I don't deserve it and I don't expect to get it. Good-by."

Later in the spring, just before she went back to Hamstead, Mary received a limp, square letter, on coarse tan-colored paper with a red triangle in the corner.

"Dear Mary," it said—

"I won't bother you by writing you again, but I can't start across without doing it this once.

"I do love you. I know you don't believe me and if you decide to marry Mr. Hamlin after all, I'll try to be glad because I know he deserves you—as much as any man can deserve you—and I don't, but I'll make you believe me, anyway when I get home. It would be silly of me to say I'll be more worthy of you then, for of course I'll never be worthy of you. But I'll make you believe me, anyway. And if I don't ever get home, please try hard to believe me without any more telling than just this. For I do. I do, with all my heart and soul. Perhaps I didn't before, but I do now.

"God bless you.

"Yours always,

"Paul."

CHAPTER XII

It was snowing hard, but Mrs. Elliott, bundling herself up well, closed the door of her spotless kitchen behind her and set out to go and "pass the afternoon" with her friend, Mrs. Gray. As long as the war had been a far-distant thing—another "crazy quarrel among them throat-cuttin' foreigners"—it had stirred feeble interest and still feebler sympathy in most of the hearts in the Connecticut valley and as it dawned gradually upon Hamstead's reluctant mind that the United States "was likely to be drawn into the horrid thing" it comforted itself with many good reasons why its own sons should not go—farmers were, of course, needed in the fields as much as soldiers in the trenches—men with families had their own responsibilities to think of first—an amazing number of cases of flat feet and weak eyes and impaired general health were discovered. But gradually, almost imperceptibly, public sentiment changed. For the first time in the history of the village, Methodists and Congregationalists and persons who professed no faith at all, the "old families" who belonged to the D. A. R. and those from "out back" who belonged to nothing more exclusive than the Foreign Missionary society, began to work together with a common interest, all petty differences forgotten.

Johnny's Persuasion

"IT'S a funny thing," said the cook, beating mashed potatoes to a creamy frothiness, "it's a funny thing that the doctor, bless his heart, is such a swell man to work for, and the idol of all his patients, and is such a devil in his own house."

"Oh, hush up, Mrs. Carey," said Molly, the maid. "Hurry up with them potatoes. I want to take in this course. They're licking up your soup like they always do, I suppose."

"Hello, Mrs. Carey," said John, the chauffeur, coming in from the kitchen porch. "May I have my dinner as soon as it's convenient? The doctor's got a date at the hospital at eight-thirty and he and I've got to hustle with dinner."

"All right, Johnny boy," said Mrs. Carey. "I'll serve you as fast as you can eat. Just get a soup plate and you can start right in."

"Say, Mrs. Carey," said Molly, returning, "there's something wrong. Miss Betty's left the table crying, and Mr. Bob is sitting there sulky and red as a beet. The doctor's giving him the—Oh, you here, Johnny? Well, you know as much as we do, I suppose. Things are in a mess, I'll say."

"Sure, I'm here, Molly. I'd always be where you are if I had my way." He winked broadly at Mrs. Carey, who smiled benignly. She favored Johnny's suit for Molly's hand. So did Molly, for that matter, but she hadn't told Johnny as yet.

"Molly, how about the movies after I get back from the hospital with the doctor?"

"O. K." said Molly. "Only Johnny, I sort of feel I ought to stay home tonight. I mean, Miss Betty seems to be in trouble, and the whole house is upset, and maybe I'll be needed."

"Sure we'll all stay in this evening," said the cook, giving Molly a platter of chops. "I'll make coffee about eleven, and we'll have toast and some of that strawberry jam—maybe Mike'll come in, too, and we can have a game of cards. It beats me how anybody who doesn't mind having the servants play cards and drink coffee at all hours can be so near-sighted they drive their own children from home."

"There's no use taking in the dinner," said Molly. "They're not eating anything. But I suppose I'll have to." And she started in.

"I hate to waste that nice pudding on them. It's Mr. Bob's favorite. Well," added the cook philosophically, "maybe he'll eat some of that and feel better. Hello, Mike," she said quietly, as a weather-beaten middle-aged man came in from the garden. "The family isn't through yet. It'll be twenty minutes till our dinner. Go in there and tell Johnny how your cucumbers are getting along."

Mike the gardener said "Hello" gruffly, grinned a little sheepishly at Mrs. Carey, and clumped noisily into the little room where John was already half through his meal.

As the voices of the two men joined in conversation, Mrs. Carey stopped Molly by the arm. "Molly," she said, "what's the trouble in there?"

"The doctor's raising Cain because he's found out Betty's engaged to that young Jack Prescott."

"But why doesn't the doctor like him?"

"Oh, he's young, and hasn't got any money. I guess that's all. And Miss Betty could have anybody she wanted, she's that lovely. And the doctor's blowing up Mr. Bob because Prescott's his friend."

At eight-fifteen John put on his hat and coat preparatory to starting out with the doctor. "Molly," he said. He and she were alone in the little room. "Molly, with all that trouble in there, why can't you and me settle things? You promise to marry me, Molly—will you?"

Molly bowed her head. Her heart fluttered, and for a moment she hesitated. Then, "No," she answered. "Johnny, I couldn't. They're so unhappy in there. It wouldn't seem—"

"But Molly, you're all wrong. It won't help them any—and—"

"Johnny!" Molly turned shining eyes toward him. "If you can get the doctor to give his blessing to Miss Betty, I'll—marry you."

At half past ten Molly and the cook and Mike heard the purr of an engine and a few minutes later John came into the kitchen. He swept across the little room, smiling exultantly, and took Molly by the shoulders.

"Molly," he said, beaming at everybody, "you're going to marry me. It's all right about Miss Betty and her young man and—"

A voice came from the pantry door. "Oh, Molly—" it was Mrs. Bartley—"I wonder if you'd bring me something to eat in the living room. Some for the rest, too," she added, "as we all seem to be hungry." Her voice sounded light, happy.

Molly beamed back at John. "How did you do it, John?" she asked.

"I told him a man could eat his heart out and die if he couldn't get the girl of his heart—and that he was killing Miss Betty. I told him you said so, that you said he was a brute and—"

"Why, Johnny," said Molly. "What did you do that for?"

"For you," said Johnny.

"Well," said Molly. "All right, Johnny, you can have me."

BIG DEMAND FOR BOOKS

A big public library was having a maximum daily attendance of 2,000 patrons seven years ago. The library board was planning a new building. Looking forward to expansion, it told the architects to make room for at least 5,000 daily users. In the first year of the new building's operation the daily attendance exceeded that figure. So far this year it has passed 10,000.—Michigan City (Ind.) News.

How to train BABY'S BOWELS

Babies, bottle-fed or breast-fed, with any tendency to be constipated, would thrive if they received daily half a teaspoonful of this old family doctor's prescription for the bowels.

That is one sure way to train tiny bowels to healthy regularity. To avoid the fretfulness, vomiting, crying, failure to gain, and other ills of constipated babies.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is good for any baby. For this, you have the word of a famous doctor. Forty-seven years of practice taught him just what babies need to keep their little bowels active, regular; keep little bodies plump and healthy. For Dr. Caldwell specialized in the treatment of women and little ones. He attended over 3500 births without loss of one mother or baby.

No More Boils or Ulcers!

Kalona, Iowa — "About 30 years ago I was bothered a great deal with boils and I suffered with an infection just above the ankle, which the physician called an ulcer. After doctoring and suffering for quite a while, the sore getting steadily worse, I started taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery," said C. C. Swartzendruber of Route 4. "Before I had finished the first bottle I noticed an improvement and continued using it until I had taken six bottles. The sore steadily healed until I was entirely rid of trouble. I haven't had a boil since that time."

"This is not insurance" --but it is a good imitation!

Here is what

The Minnesota Benevolent Society

does for its members:

Pays all Doctor Bills (except as below)
Pays 75% of Doctor Bills on Rural Calls
Pays One-Half of bill in Tonsilectomy Cases
Pays $15.00 in Maternity Cases (where member has been in the Society nine months)
Pays $15.00 a week Hospital Allowance
Pays for extraction of one tooth in emergency cases
Pays up to $500.00 of bills as above, for each member, in any single case

Here is what the Society will not do:

Pay for medicine, X-ray, or first consultation without treatment.

We Are Not Wishing Anybody Any Hard Luck---

But ask yourself this question, "What would I do if I met with an accident, or became sick and had to have an operation?" It is at such times that the Society comes to the aid of its members, by paying bills as described above.

The Cost of This Service

One Dollar is paid upon entering the Society.

Fifty Cents is the limit of any donations called for.

However, since the Society was created last Summer only four 25-cent donations were requested, to pay about 200 doctor bills and 50 hospital bills. There was an exceptional amount of sickness during the winter months just passed.

The probability is that calls for donations will be less frequent during the summer months.

JOIN NOW!

You never can tell when you will get hurt or sick and need a doctor's care. At a cost of less than 1 cent a day, 20c a month, you can have this protection.

Swimming Silver

SOME 12,000 years ago, when the northern countries were in cold storage under the glacial ice-sheet, a rough hairy man sat and slowly, but skilfully, traced upon a piece of reindeer bone a picture of salmon swimming in a stream. This was the first record we have of one of the most widely-known fish on today's market.

In 1653, no less famous an angler than Izaak Walton wrote: "The salmon is accounted the king of fresh-water fish"—and this genial old fisherman was well acquainted with salmon both on the hook and on the platter.

Perfect Salmon See Cans

Could Izaak Walton have tasted this king of fresh-water fish in its present day quality can, he might have turned to canning instead of fishing. For salmon drawn from the clear, cold waters of the north, with their surging tides and restless waves, are "swimming silver" — clean and wholesome. They are perfectly fit at the moment of canning. They have just come up from deep ocean in their finest form—their flesh firm and hard, layers of fat solidly built, and the color the deepest it will ever become.

The intricate "iron-chink"—a machine which prepares them for the can—does a miraculous job in removing the head, tail, fins and entrails, putting them in readiness for the rigid inspection which they must undergo before entering the can.

An old gentleman and h[illegible] returning to the tourist [illegible] inspecting a salmon ca[illegible] voiced the universal [illegible] visitors who have watched [illegible] careful methods used in cann[illegible] salmon. "Yes," the old lady said with a satisfied sigh, "they clean and prepare them just as one would do in one's own kitchen."

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

In checking up on rural accidents, I find that 402 automobile pedestrian accidents that occurred in a four month period showed 348 pedestrians were injured and 71 were killed.

Most of these accidents occurred during dusk and darkness, and it is this time of the day that people using the highways in the rural districts should be very, very careful.

Walking across the road without looking in either direction is a mistake. Automobiles move quietly and swiftly. Often times distances and speed can be misjudged and as a result you will find yourself in the middle of a road and underneath an auto.

Always walk along roads facing traffic so that you can see easily. Never cross the roar until you are absolutely sure that the path is clear and you have time to get across.

Be careful after dark.

"Cyclone Sally" To Be Presented Here Tonight And Tomorrow Night

The three act comedy "Cyclone Sally" will be presented by students of the local high school at the school auditorium Friday and Saturday evenings of this week. The performances will start at 8 o'clock.

The play that is being given this year is one that has received much favorable comment where previously presented. It abounds in humorous situations and at the same time contains a well developed plot.

The plot evolves around the rather wreck-less, but thoroughly likeable Jack Webster who determines that the only way to regain his lost wealth is to marry Sue Bascohm, a young lady of the newly rich. Cyclone Sally, who is everything that her name suggests, learns of Jack's plan and immediately sets a clever trap for him to fall into. For a while things seem pretty hopeless for Jack, but everything comes out happily although unexpectedly.

The title role will be carried by Gladys Sanoden, and Stilaf Anderson will take the part of Jack. Others in the cast are: Reuben Carlson, in the role of a young English gentleman by the name of Reginald Manners; Beulah Bennes, as Jenny Tatcher, who appreciates single bliss more than she does her farm hand admirer Jim Jerkins (Murnet Johnson); Frederick Voth, as Willie Clump, who is always forgetting the things he was going to remember; Eunice Johnson, as Vivian Vernon, who has wealth and wants Jack; Ethel Nohre, as Effie Varden, who is a frequent visitor at the Webster country estate; and Eunice Lindholm, as Ruth Tatcher, who has a weakness for Englishmen.

Between acts Kate Smith will be impersonated in a novelty skit "Me and My Shadow" by Clara Sandberg, the Evenson sisters will sing several of the popular songs, and Elvin Jarshaw will play numbers on the banjo.

Special Mother's Day Program at Luther League Sunday Eve

The Luther League will give a special Mother's Day program in the church basement Sunday evening, May 14, at 8 o'clock, as follows:

IN MEMORIAM

Gilbert O. Johnson, who passed on to his eternal reward, two sad years ago, March 9, 1931:

We miss you dad, of all you knew,
We sadly grieve for you, 'tis true,
But hopelessly we do not mourn,
Although with pain our hearts are torn.
We cannot clasp your strong hand, not yet,
Because we have not conquered death,
And yet we feel your presence near,
For echoes of your life we hear.
Your constant thots of others need
Not only thought, but kindly deed.
Is like an aftermath of peace,
A blessing which will never cease.
And when from out our bourne of time and peace
The angels of death shall bear us far
We hope to see you, dad, face to face
When we have crossed the Harbor Bar.

Sadly missed by Mrs. Clara Johnson and children.

Feed Variety Important

Variety in the dairy ration is very important. If an animal in good health loses its appetite, the ration usually lacks variety. When several concentrates are included in the ration, there is less danger of a lack of any certain kind of protein or mineral matter than when a smaller number is used. Two kinds of roughage, one a succulent feed and the other a good legume hay, are desirable.

SCHOOL NOTES

HIGH SCHOOL

Reviewing in all subjects is taking place at the present time.

Upper Grades

Glenn had the best seventh grade paper in Arithmetic on Monday. Robert and Lorna had the best sixth grade papers.

This week we are having our classes in room eight downstairs.

The Eighth Grade class had a meeting on Monday to choose their class motto and flower. Their motto is "Climb though the rocks be rugged," and their flower is the purple lilac.

The U.S. Constitution is being studied by the Eighth Grade Citizenship Class.

The best work in seventh grade Geography last week was done by Bernice, Glenn, Lowell, and Arnold.

After questioning all the others in our grades, the sixth grade found out that most of the pupils dream almost every night, that their dreams are often unpleasant, but that they still continue dreaming.

Grades III, IV and V

The fifth grade had the best average in Spelling last Friday.

The following children had one hundred in Spelling:

Morris Bottem, Romal Burtness, Jean Sorum, Lorene Fluke, Roy Hagberg, Marion Olson, Lyla Kolden.

Milton Hanson was the first to furnish his windmill when we had our Reading Chart. Marion Olson was second.

Our room is making butterflies in Art class.

Grades I and II

The following children had 100 in Spelling last Friday.

Second grade: Lillian, Ruby, Ruth, Rueben, Wayne.

First grade: Oliver, Harley, Luella, Mary, Alma, Yvonne, and Howard.

In Language class the first grade are studying the poem, "Only One Mother," by George Cooper. They are also trying original poetry, some of which we expect to publish next week.

Declamatory Contest Held

The annual Declamatory Contest of the rural schools of the Holt Section, was held at the schoolhouse at Holt last Thursdsy evening. Judges of the contest were Misses Jeanette Lanman, Eunice Johnson, and Edith Anderson.

First place in the lower class was awarded to Yvonne Oakey of Sunnyside, second place to Verna Johnson of Pioneer, and third place to Francis Johnson of Pleasant View.

In the upper class, first place was awarded to Gordon Herom of Sunnyside, second place to Evelyn Larson of Sunnyside and third place to Inez Anderson of Pioneer.

Play Day activities were held at Sunnyside on Friday, with Sunnyside scoring first and Pioneer second.

Highway Reduces Force

Field forces of the Minnesota Highway department's construction division now number 543 compared with 1,068 a year ago, according to an announcement by the department. The reduction was made necessary by reduced funds which prevented authorization of new construction work in 1933. Reductions in force also have been made in the Highway department's office in St. Paul.

Dr. Holmstrom Named Official County Surgeon

As an experimental measure in an effort to lower medical and sugical costs against the Marshall County Poor Funds, Dr. C. H. Holmstrom of Warren was appointed county physician and surgeon by the board of commissioners at their meeting early last week.

Dr. Holmstrom, a staff member of the Warren Hospital and member of the Warren Clinic, was appointed to serve a three month term for the purpose of studying costs of medical attention against the poor funds. Under the plan, all cases that are county cases are to be sent to Warren for treatment with hospitalization at a reduced rate at the Warren Hospital. Only in cases of greatest emergency, will a county charge be permitted to elsewhere for care.

The board also passed the necessary resolution to start action with the Conservation commission regarding the Marshall county ditch tax relief bill adopted into law at the last session of the legislature. Work on the proposition will get under way immediately.

The new discount tax laws were also discussed by the board, a resolution being passed that no discount would be permitted on ditch taxes but a reduction was made in the interest charges from 12 to six per cent.

A resolution was also passed requesting the state highway department to route the new Roseau-Bemidji road directly south from Grygla to the Marshall county line.—Warren Sheaf.

Funeral Services Held

Under the auspices of the local American Legion post, with a color guard and detail, funeral services were held Tuesday of last week in Satesdal church for Arne Sordal Nilson World War veteran who died at the Oakland Park Sanatorium Friday, April 28. Rev. Tungseth officiated at the services. Mr. Nilson was born in Norway 44 years ago and has lived in this vicinity since 1902, on a farm in Agdar township.

Surviving him are his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Nils Sordal; two sisters, Mrs. Bergit Olson of Pontiac, Michigan, and Mrs. C. Anderson of Shaunavon, Sask., Canada; and three brothers; John, Amund, and Targe of Admiral, Sask., the latter three of whom were present at the funeral.—T. R. Falls Times.

State Road System Ranks 19th

Minnesota ranks nineteenth among the other states in mileage of improved state roads, according to a table published by the American Association of State Highway Officials.

In mileage of state roads paved with concrete, Minnesota stands twelfth.

The national compilation accepts the entire 6,770 miles of Minnesota's original trunk system as being improved, since practically the entire amount has some surfacing, even if not permanently improved.

Pennsylvanian is shown in first place in mileage of state improved roads, with 34,000 miles. In concrete pavement, Illinois lead the nation with 11,173 miles, compared with Minnesota's 2,400.

Thief Lake Bird Banding Station

Thief Lake has been designated as a federal game bird banding station, Dist. Game Warden Munch of Crookston announced while in Thief River Falls last week says the Times. He reported that Wardens Martin Nelson of Fertile and Allan Bratland of Ada have made a large floating trap at the lake and are banding 1000 ducks under the auspices of the state game and fish department.

A total of 160 mallards with clipped wings were released in the lake last week together with 200 others that were wintered over, and these birds are expected, as last year, to attract thousands of ducks on their way north. The wardens are now feeding corn to the birds.

A five-acre tract of pasture and water is to be fenced in to accommodate a shipment of Canadian geese, which it is hoped will draw the flight of geese back to this section. Warden Munch reported that water in the lake this spring is slightly above last year's level, and that, with the ground well soaked, spring rains should materially raise the level.

Minnesota Celebrates 75th Anniversary As A State

Minnesota wrote a big 75 on the the book of time yesterday, May 11, when it commemorated the day it entered the Union as a sovereign state in swaddling clothes May 11, 1858.

Then it had a population of 150,000 souls and area abounded in timber, fur bearing animals, Indians and iron ore.

Seventy-five years, however, have wrought vast changes in the Gopher state. It now has a population of more than 2,500,000 persons but timber, from a commercial standpoint, has vanished, and the number of fur bearing animals has been sadly depleted. Indians, too, have dwindled in number, what few remaining, ekeing out a living on reservations. Iron ore, remains on the ranges, millions of unmined tons of it.

State-wide celebrations this week are marking the observance by Minnesotans of the milestones passed by the state during the parade of the years when changes undreamed of then took place with each succeeding decade.

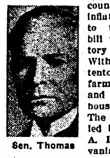
Senate Passes Farm Bill With the Inflation Amendment—Roosevelt to Ask Authority to Deal With War Debts—Herriot Enters Conversations.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

BACKED by the administration, by the big Democratic majority in the senate and apparently by the favor of a large part of the population of the country, the Thomas inflation amendment to the farm relief bill won an easy victory in the senate. With this most portentous addition the farm bill was passed and sent back to the house for concurrence. The anti-inflationists, led by Senator David A. Reed of Pennsylvania, made a desperate but hopeless fight, arguing that while "controlled" inflation, as promised by the amendment's sponsors, might temporarily restore a measure of prosperity to the nation, previous experience here and abroad showed that control could not be maintained and that the ultimate results would be disastrous. Reed, Tydings of Maryland, a Democrat, and others seemed terribly dismayed by the prospects for the future and their sincerity could not be doubted.



Sen. Thomas

Senator Thomas of Oklahoma himself led the debate for the affirmative, opening with the startling statement that the amendment, if it prevailed, should transfer value to the extent of almost $200,000,000,000 from the creditor class to the debtor class. Of course, the effect of this assertion is greatly weakened when one realizes that our people cannot really be divided into such classes. There is scarcely a creditor in the land who is not also a debtor, and vice versa. But this point and many another were ignored by the proponents of inflation. Senator Pat Harrison of Mississippi, for instance, on the second day of the debate, confined his efforts mainly to taunting the "Mellon-Mills-Reed" group for its alleged failures during the Hoover administration.

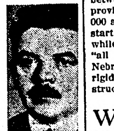
The Wheeler-King silver coinage amendment was accepted by the senate. It would enable the President to fix the ratio between gold and silver and to provide for unlimited coinage of both metals at the ratio so fixed.

JUST what inflation, even if "controlled," will do to the nation and its business is a question on which economists and financiers are as far apart as the poles. For the present the prospect of its adoption and the abandonment of the gold standard have served to create almost a boom in certain lines of business, and the prices of commodities have begun to rise. But how this will in the long run benefit the ordinary citizen has not been shown to the satisfaction of most of us.

An especially dangerous clause in the Thomas amendment is the one giving the President power to devalue the gold dollar to the extent of 50 per cent. Senator Borah, an inflationist, argued that this would be declared unconstitutional. It may be this power will never be exercised by the President, but if it is it will be followed by steps to abrogate the gold clause in bonds, mortgages and other contracts. Provision for such action is made in the pending Goldsborough bill which provides that existing contracts shall be satisfied by payment of their face amount in legal tender, that after its enactment, gold clause contracts cannot be made legally and that any profit made from exchanging gold for legal tender would be subject to a 100 per cent tax.

Some experts are of the opinion that the inflation bill may never be used; that it is "a mere bluff intended to have the very effect it is now having—arresting and reversing the downward course of prices," and giving the President a better position in the economic conversations with foreign statesmen, as did the abandonment of the gold standard, which also was inflationary.

WAR debts and reduction of armaments came to the fore in the White House conversations as Prime Minister MacDonald concluded his part of the parleys and prepared to depart for home, and former Premier Edouard Herriot of France began his sessions with the President. These three gentlemen met together, and after an informal dinner, Mr. Roosevelt took up the disarmament question with them, his evident purpose being to bring France into line at the Geneva conference. French demands for guarantees of security against attack, which have blocked all agreement hitherto, were discussed by the President, and it was said he indicated that he was "searching sincerely for means of associating the United States" with international efforts to check aggressor nations. Such association might take the form of consultation with signatories of the Kellogg peace pact in the event of its violation. And in addition there is the administration bill authorizing the President to join other nations in declaring embargoes on arms and munitions.



M. Herriot

As for the war debts, they were first brought up by Mr. MacDonald, who let Mr. Roosevelt know that Great Britain would like a downward revision; and their communique said that the basis was laid of a clearer understanding of the situation affecting the two nations, though no plan or settlement was under way yet. This encouraged M. Herriot and his expert associates to press the arguments of France for cancellation.

Then Mr. Roosevelt let the correspondents know that he was planning to ask congress for authority to reopen the war debt settlements and negotiate a reduction of the 11 billions which European nations owe the United States. If he were vested with this power the United States would enter the London conference prepared to bargain for stabilization of currencies on a modified gold basis, remonetization of silver, lowering of tariffs and other trade barriers and adoption of measures to raise commodity prices and restore purchasing power.

Members of the French delegation said the President had promised MacDonald and Herriot that he would ask congress for authority to postpone the debt installments due June 15, and that in return Herriot would ask the French parliament to pay the defaulted December 15 payment of $19,000,000.

As Mr. MacDonald said good-by to the White House, he and Mr. Roosevelt announced that they had agreed on the following:

An increase in the general level of commodity prices.

Re-orientation of commercial policies.

Reduction of tariffs, quotas and exchange restrictions.

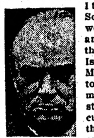
World expansion of credit.

Capital expenditures by governments to stimulate business.

Re-establishment of an international monetary standard.

Improvement of the status of silver.

PRIME MINISTER RICHARD B. Bennett of Canada was already in Washington to talk with the President; Finance Minister Guido Jung of Italy and Hjalmar Schacht of Germany were on their way, and Japan announced that Viscount Kikujiro Ishii would arrive May 23. Mr. Bennett told the newspaper men that Canada stands ready to discuss any proposals that look toward closer commercial relations with the United States, and said the Ottawa agreements do not affect these trading possibilities. In a prepared statement he used these emphatic phrases:



R. B. Bennett

"We have reached a point where it is certain that nothing but united action can avert world disaster."

"Immediate action is imperative."

"The world is in tragic trouble and distress."

"If we do not soon defeat the forces of disruption and discord, they will defeat us."

"We must act boldly and unselfishly, otherwise we shall be certain witnesses of the wreck of our civilization."

Asked whether Canada really had gone off the gold standard, as had been asserted by Finance Minister Rhodes, the prime minister replied: "Canada is as much off the gold standard and as much on the gold standard as the United States."

REFUSING to accept the Norris senate bill as a substitute, the house passed the McSwain bill for the operation of the Muscle Shoals development, the vote being 306 to 91. Seventeen Republicans and five Farmer-Laborites voted with the majority.

The house version is regarded as a less drastic measure than the Norris bill. The principal point of difference between the two is that the house bill provides an appropriation of $10,000,000 and a bond issue of $50,000,000 for starting the development program, while the Norris bill simply authorizes "all appropriation necessary." The Nebraskan's measure is likewise more rigid with regard to government construction of power transmission lines.

WHEN the world disarmament conference resumed its sessions in Geneva the French plan for an antiwar pact of consultation was presented by Rene Massigli. It excluded the American continent on the ground that it was impossible at present to make the pact universal. Massigli suggested the creation in the capital of each signatory power of a commission which would determine violations of the Briand-Kellogg pact and the rights of a victim to assistance.

Concrete measures to prevent misuse of civil airplanes for military purposes were presented by the United States, Canada, Argentina and Japan.

MUSSOLINI'S four-power peace plan is causing a lot of excited discussion in various European countries. Great Britain and Germany might gladly agree to this, but France still asserts the sanctity of treaties must be respected, and in this she is of course supported by all the nations of the little entente, and by Poland. In Czechoslovakia especially sentiment was aroused, and Foreign Minister Edouard Benes told the parliament in Prague that whoever desires to change the boundaries of that country must bring an army along with him. He criticized the Mussolini plan as a "great backward step," and added: "History shows that surrender of territory always is connected with the bloodiest wars."

SOVIET Russia was on the verge of a quarrel with Japan over the equipment of the Chinese Eastern railway, and in that connection it was interesting to note that a new alignment was bringing Russia and France together, the former drifting away from Germany and the latter beginning to take sides against Japan. Already the French and Russians have arranged for exchange of military information and military instructors. Before long the situation on the European continent may be pan-Germanism against pan-Slavism, with France on the side of the latter and Italy with the former.

CONTINUED Chinese resistance near Kupeikow pass on the road to Peiping so enraged the Japanese military command that it announced the early occupation of all strategic points in the North China area. With this in view, the Japanese launched a general attack south of the Great Wall designed to open the way to the old Chinese capital. As usual, Japan finds a ready excuse for offensive movements already planned.

The Manchukuoan government has announced that only nations recognizing that state will benefit by its promise of an open door trade policy.

THE Nazi campaign against the Jews in Germany continues with vigor. Dr. Joseph Goebbels, minister of propaganda, speaking at Cologne, said: "We consider the Jews our enemies, but hitherto have exercised a clemency which the Jews do not deserve. If they believe that this clemency is weakness we will quickly teach them differently."

Goebbels proclaimed May 1 as the "festal day of national labor," to the disgust of the Communists, who have long considered that day sacred to their cause.

Students of Kiel university asked the rector to compel 28 Jewish professors to resign.

The anti-Jewish movement also was manifested in Rumania, where a ten-day boycott of all Jewish shops in the province of Bukovina was ordered by a Fascist organization.

FORMER Gov. Nellie Tayloe Ross of Wyoming finally has been placed in a federal position. The President appointed her director of the mint. Obviously Mrs. Ross was entitled to a good place, for as vice chairman of the Democratic national committee and head of the party's women's organization she has been very active and valuable.

"REPUBLICAN Federal Associates" is the name given an organization just formed by men prominent in the Hoover administration to aid the party in returning to power in the 1934 congressional elections. Walter F. Brown, former postmaster general, is its president, and Ogden Mills, secretary of the treasury under Hoover, is chairman of the board. Arch Coleman, who was first assistant postmaster general in the Hoover administration, is in charge of Washington headquarters, and W. Irving Glover, who was second assistant postmaster general, is director of organization.

Ogden Mills

Mr. Coleman said the organization was primarily to keep together those who have been active in Republican circles for the last twelve years; to keep them advised of what is going on, and to bring back to the party fold those Republicans who supported Roosevelt last year.

Ernest Lee Jahncke, the Hoover assistant secretary of the navy, is first vice president; Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, second vice president; Charles J. Moos, third vice president; William R. Castle, treasurer, and Coleman, general secretary.

Six of the Hoover cabinet members are represented on the board of directors—Mills, Brown, Roy D. Chapin, Arthur M. Hyde, William N. Doak and Ray Lyman Wilbur. Others include Walter E. Hope, former assistant secretary of the treasury; James J. Patchell, Union City, Ind.; Mrs. Longworth, Castle, Moos, St. Paul; Jahncke, Harry Culver, Culver, Calif.; Coleman, Glover, John Richardson, Boston; Ferry K. Heath, former assistant secretary of the treasury, and Mrs. Albert G. Sims, New Mexico.

WISCONSIN has the honor of being the second state to ratify the prohibition repeal amendment to the Constitution, and the first to do that by unanimous vote. Fifteen delegates, assembled in the Capitol building in Madison, were addressed by Governor Schmedeman, and in eight minutes thereafter the resolution of ratification had been drawn up and adopted to the accompaniment of cheers.

How I Broke Into The Movies

Copyright by Hal C. Herman

By MARY PICKFORD

AN INSIGNIFICANT little street car transfer turned Mary Pickford's career from the stage to world-wide fame on the screen.

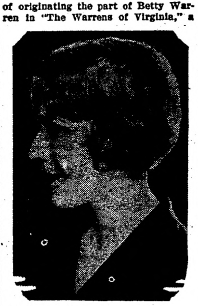
On her way to a theatrical booking agency in the Times square district, Mary, at her mother's behest, stopped in the old Biograph studio on Fourteenth street, New York, before using the transfer.

Thus in a nutshell, you have the story of the rise of Mary Pickford.

Her theatrical career began in the Valentine Stock company in the city of Toronto, Canada, where she was born. Her first appearance on the speaking stage was made at the age of five, when she took the part of a boy in a play called "The Silver King."

At the age of eight, "America's Sweetheart" went on the road with "The Little Red Schoolhouse," and at the age of nine Mary was starred in "The Fatal Wedding" in the part of Jessie the little mother. When but eleven she was appearing with Chauncey Olcott in "Edmund Burke."

To Miss Pickford belongs the honor of originating the part of Betty Warren in "The Warrens of Virginia," a David Belasco production which was her first play on Broadway.



Mary Pickford.

From Belasco's management, she went into motion pictures, but let her tell the story in her own words at this point.

"You see," she said, "I did not think much of the movies at that time. In fact, people on the legitimate stage considered it a disgrace to work in pictures. But my mother had asked me to go to the Biograph studio on Fourteenth street and try to see Mr. Griffith. Although I demurred, she insisted, and of course, I could not disobey. But I took the precaution to route my trip so that I could make five cents do the work of 10. Those were times when five cents was always doing the work of ten.

"Instead of taking a street car from where we lived to Fourteenth street, I walked the ten blocks, took the car on Fourteenth and asked for a transfer. The old Biograph studio was on Fourteenth street between Broadway and Fifth avenue. Thus, when I had satisfied mother by dropping in at the studio, I could walk back to Broadway and use my transfer to ride to the Times square and the theatrical district where the booking offices were located.

"I felt certain that in the end it would be necessary to visit the booking offices to obtain another theatrical engagement, which at that moment I needed very badly. Imagine my surprise then when I was ushered into the august presence of Mr. Griffith who, after a short talk, gave me my first motion picture engagement."

From such a simple beginning, a new figure in world history was born. Even today few people realize how far into the distant corners of the earth our Mary's popularity has reached. Her mail brings letters in nearly every language. Furthermore, Miss Pickford is the only woman in motion pictures who is socially honored by the real royalties of Europe. When she travels people at every station crowd the platform for a glimpse of her. And with all this she is a charming, wistful young woman, happy in the love of a devoted husband. Still there are many simple pleasures which she has had to do without, pleasures which her less famous neighbors accept as a matter of course.

You may wonder from this if she is happy with her lot. The answer is yes. But even the reason for her being happy in spite of missing things which other people enjoy, is in itself a simple thing. Her work makes others happy. Therein lies her compensation. She has learned that service to others is the one coin that pays the debts we owe our hearts.

Gets Leading Role

Miss Alice Dahl was a former member of one of the Little Theater movements in southern California, which has supplied the screen with so many promising young actresses recently, and has played minor roles in pictures, but "Free Ranger" marks her first appearance in a leading role. She is one of the finest horsewomen in Hollywood, which was greatly in her favor when she was chosen for the role opposite McCoy.

Butcher Built Up Good Trade in Smoked Rats

A Czechoslovakian butcher living in Petrzalk, a suburb of Bratislava, was recently arrested for selling smoked rats to his customers without a special license for so doing, says the New York Times.

The butcher, to defend himself, explained that most of his customers were too poor to buy any other kind of meat and were so grateful for the chance to obtain any meat at all that he was doing a fair business selling the rat flesh.

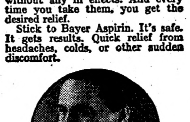
So carefully had the rats been prepared for human consumption that eating their flesh should not prove dangerous to health, in the opinion of veterinary officials to whom specimens of the rats found hanging in the butcher shop were sent for examination.

STOPS a Headache

There seems to be no safer way to end a headache—and there certainly is no safer way—than two tablets of Bayer Aspirin.

You've heard doctors say Bayer Aspirin is safe. If you've tried it, you know it's effective. You could take these tablets every day in the year without any ill effects. And every time you take them, you get the desired relief.

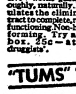
Stick to Bayer Aspirin. It's safe. It gets results. Quick relief from headaches, colds, or other sudden discomfort.

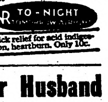


Can Be Overdone

In being high-toned, don't make the tone so high that you get off the popular key.

What SHE TOLD WORN-OUT HUSBAND





SHE could have reproached him for his fits of temper—his "all in" complaints. But wisely she saw in his frequent colds, his "fagged out," "on edge" condition the very trouble she herself had whipped. Constipation! The very morning after taking NR (Nature's Remedy), as she advised, he felt like himself again—keenly alert, peppy, cheerful. NR—the safe, dependable, all-vegetable laxative and corrective—works gently, thoroughly, naturally. It stimulates the eliminative tract to complete, regular functioning. Non-habit-forming. NR TO-NIGHT

"TUMS" Quick relief for acid indigestion, heartburn. Only 10c.

Says Her Husband Lost 16 Pounds In 4 Weeks

"I have never found a medicine that 'peps' you up like Kruschen Salts and better still, leaves you 'pepped up.' I take it two or three times a week—not to reduce but merely to feel good and clean. My husband took it to reduce, he lost 16 pounds in 4 weeks." Mrs. E. A. Ferris, Washington, D. C. (December 29, 1932).

To lose fat and at the same time gain in physical attractiveness and feel spirited and youthful take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water before breakfast every morning.

A jar that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle at any drugstore in the world but be sure and get Kruschen Salts the SAFE way to reduce wide hips, prominent front and double chin and again feel the joy of living—money back if dissatisfied after the first jar.

Stupidity's Toll

Stupidity has caused as much sorrow as sin.

DOES YOUR BACK ACHE?

St. Paul—"Before one of my babies arrived I was so weak and all tired out I had no ambition whatever, suffered from nervous and bilious headaches, would have swollen ankles, and my back would ache considerably," said Mrs. Frances Nelson of 258 Norris St. "Thru a friend and the advice of a doctor I took Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. I noticed a great improvement soon after starting to use it, and when I had finished the fourth bottle I felt entirely well again."

Cases for Dainty Gifts in Order

Combine Usefulness and Beauty, and Always Remembrance.

Dainty gifts of usefulness in a home are especially in demand for hope chests. The engaged girl appreciates these household presents especially when they are made by the giver, or at least have some touches of her handwork on them.

Cases will be needed for wedding presents of flat silverware, a name given to all such pieces as knives, forks, spoons, of all sizes and sorts, sugar tongs, etc., since they lie flat or nearly so on a table.

A case is exquisite when made of silk and ribbon, and as each case takes but a small quantity of material, the cost of the beautiful gifts remains small. For practical use, cases of deep red or green double-faced canton flannel are excellent. This textile is similar to extra heavy outing flannel, which can be used as a substitute.

A set of three quilted silk cases is mentioned as a good sort of present for three girls to make and give the prospective bride. The silk can be bought ready quilted, or this stitchery can be done by the givers themselves. The running stitches can be taken diagonally across each case in opposite directions, thus forming diamond quilting. Or half dollars can be laid on the lining material and a pencil drawn about them, and these circles be run through lining, lightly wadded interlining, and outside silk. Do the tracing before assembling the three parts named, for so only will the circles be accurate.

A silver case in any style is a very unusual bridge prize, and a set of three is sure to delight a winner. Silk should be used as the outside material if choice cases are awards. For the homemaker who wishes to have these cases for her own silver, canton flannel cases are perfectly satisfactory. For articles to contribute to fairs and other sales, this sort will sell fastest, as it can be priced lowest. Of course, this is assuming the material has to be purchased, and is not to be found in a piece bag. Often left-over pieces of dress or good lingerie silk can be found in such a bag, and be put to the best of uses in fashioning silver cases.

POISON in Your bowels!

Poisons absorbed into the system from souring waste in the bowels, cause that dull, headachy, sluggish, bilious condition; coat the tongue; foul the breath; sap energy, strength and nerve-force. A little of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin will clear up trouble like that, gently, harmlessly, in a hurry. The difference it will make in your feelings over night will prove its merit to you.

Dr. Caldwell studied constipation for over forty-seven years. This long experience enabled him to make his prescription just what men, women, old people and children need to make their bowels help themselves. Its natural, mild, thorough action and its pleasant taste commend it to everyone. That's why "Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin," as it is called, is the most popular laxative drugstores sell.

Large Pimples on Face Twelve Years

Healed by Cuticura

"I was troubled with pimples all over my face, neck, back and arms. They were hard, large and red, and hurt when I touched them. They festered and scaled over and at times I could hardly stand to have my clothes touch my back and arms. I could get no rest or sleep and was in that condition about ten or twelve years.

"I read an advertisement for Cuticura Soap and Ointment and sent for a free sample of each. I purchased more and after using two cakes of Cuticura Soap and two twenty-five cent boxes of Ointment I was healed." (Signed) Mrs. Marsha Nevils, R. 6, Box 125, LaGrange, Texas, July 26, '32.

Cuticura Soap 25c. Ointment 25c and 50c. Talcum 25c. Sold everywhere. One sample each free. Address: "Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. R, Malden, Mass."—Adv.

—14—

Mrs. Elliott had seen Mrs. Gray watching her slow approach through the deep snow from the kitchen windows, and had waved a greeting. Now, as she mounted the porch, she shook her umbrella and stamped the snow from her overshoes.

"No, I ain't a bit wet," she said, returning Mrs. Gray's hearty kiss. "I'm dressed real warm. If we're goin' to set in the kitchen, I guess I won't lay off my overshoes. If I keep 'em on my feet, it'll take 'em off my mind."

This point being satisfactorily settled, the two ladies sat down in rockers beside the stove and started work on their sleeveless sweaters, Mrs. Elliott, as usual, scarcely stopping for breath before she began her recital of the recent news of the neighborhood.

"Have you heard that old Mis' Hunter, up to White Water is married again? Mr. Taylor tried to reason with her, seein' he's buried four of her husbands already, but she said, as long as the Lord took 'em, she would. Shockin', ain't it?—How's the baby? I shouldn't have thought that Austin could have borne to go off and leave that little helpless creature, but it seems to be thrivin', don't it? I don't s'pose you have the least notion he'd want to marry again, not for a while, anyway. Yes, I knew he was real fond of Sylvia, but men are human. Writes you real regular, does he? And Thomas, too? I'm always real pleased to hear about your boys, but I declare I steer clear of Violet Mannin' these days. You know how set she was against Paul goin' to war. But now she's got the biggest service flag in town and 'we are 100 per cent subscribed' on her Liberty loan card. I bet all she bought was $50 bonds, don't you? Be that as it may, mornin', noon and night she don't open her head except to talk about 'her hero.' Goes around with a letter of Paul's in her hand, and—"

"Does he write her regular?"

"Seems to. I can't make out that he's ben in any great danger yet, and I've questioned her close. Enjoyin' himself considerable, I should say. Them Mannin' children always just itched and hankered to get out of Hamstead and I shouldn't be a mite surprised if that itchin' and hankerin' didn't have somethin' to do with Paul's 'patriotism' and Blanche's 'romance.' And that brings me to my main piece of news—Philip Starr's number's been called and he's goin' to Devens this week. Blanche's comin' home for the present and I hear she's mad clear through."

"Oh, the poor child!"

"Poor child nothin'. I don't deny Blanche is pretty and pleasant, but there ain't nothin' very deep about her. I bet she's lookin' forward to comin' here with lots of good-lookin' clothes and new ideas and puttin' on airs with her old neighbors. Mary's got her faults, but I'll say this for her, she ain't near so high and mighty as the rest of the family. Well, I must start along home. Clearin', ain't it? Well, this'll make nice sleighin' and that's one thing to be thankful for. It's lucky we got a few comforts left."

Philip had longed to volunteer in the first days of the war and Blanche had been so bitterly opposed to it that he had given in to her wishes, trying not to let her see the bitter spiritual struggle and loss of self-esteem which it had cost him to do this. But when the draft came, there could be no question of evasion or hesitation. His little income would keep her comfortable, and there was no child. This, Blanche knew, had been a source of disappointment and grief to Philip while she had secretly rejoiced at "not being tied down right away." Now the fact that a baby might have kept him at home made her resentful that she did not have one.

It was out of the question for her to stay on in the little Brookline apartment alone, and there was nothing for her to do but to return, rebelliously, to Hamstead. Philip, with never-failing understanding and gentleness, saw how hard it was for her to do this, and insisting that it should hereafter be called "Carte Blanche" to perpetuate his joke, urged her again to amuse herself by having the little law office renovated to suit the plans which he had made so long before. This time, the suggestion was a godsend. Blanche became genuinely interested and worked harder and more happily than she ever had done before in order to have the tiny home in perfect order for his first furlough. There was a merry little housewarming, when Philip appeared, wearing his sergeant's uniform, for all Hamstead wanted to see him.

But after the last guest had departed, he lighted a fire in the wide, shallow fireplace of the big, soft-colored bedroom, and unfastened Blanche's party dress by candle-light as they stood before it. It had grown very cold outside, and the many-paned windows were frosting over with delicate shapes. The man, looking towards them from the fire, suddenly shivered a little. They were so icy and sparkling, reflecting the frozen moonlight out there, that there was something of almost unearthly loveliness about them, something ghostly—

"Blanche," he said abruptly, "when you fixed up Carte Blanche, what did you do with those old law books that were here?"

Blanche was standing before the mirror, combing her hair. She did not even turn.

"They were so musty and shabby and dry-looking, I burned them up. Why, did you want them?"

"No. Did you burn them all?"

"Yes."

"Read any of them first?"

"No. I could tell by the looks that they were dull. Not what you and I wanted in our lovely home."

She walked across the room to him, her golden hair falling over her shoulders, her soft white dressing-gown flowing from her bare neck and arms in an unbroken line to the floor. Deliberately, she blew out the flickering candles, one after the other, and, in the dim firelight, put her arms around his neck.

"It is lovely, isn't it?" she whispered.

Philip bent over her. There was something in her manner that had never been there before. Was she, too, feeling the mystery and power of the night? Had these last weeks of separation been teaching her, too—teaching her the lessons that for a time, it seemed as if he, for all his love, had failed to make clear to her? Was the dread which had been slowly growing through the spring and summer that his white star was to prove only a will-o'-the-wisp, to be taken from him after all?

"Yes, sweetheart, beautiful," he answered. "But I want you to know a story that was in one of those books you burned, just the same, if you don't already. I ought to have spoken of it to you before—"

As quietly as he could, he told her first of his reading of the legend and then of his talk with Mary about it afterwards.

"I can't pretend to explain it. But it seems to me the first Blanche didn't want to hurt any person, especially—that it isn't a curse in that sense—but to teach her descendants, if she could, what a terrible thing it is to be selfish. Most of all, the selfishness that calls itself love. Occasionally mothers feel that kind of love for their sons, or children for their parents, or husbands for their wives—"

"You mean that is the kind that Colonel Moses felt for the countess," said Blanche slowly, "and—and it's been so, straight through the family. That's the way mother cares for Paul. That's the way—that's the way I cared for you—once. But, oh, I don't any more!"

"That isn't the way I've cared for you," said Philip. "I'm not very strong, and I'm not very good. I don't think that for a minute. But I do love you with all my heart and soul. That—that makes more difference than anything else, I believe. That curse is never going beyond this generation, and you must tell me tonight, that you're glad—I ought to have gone to war when I first knew it was the right thing for me to do. We can't help that now. But you've got to say you're glad I'm going now—"

His arms tightened around her, his lips, meeting hers, lay for a long time against them.

"If only we had a son—"

"Whenever I think of Lady Blanche farm," he went on, after a long silence, "I think of you and the brook—its freshness and fragrance and purity. It's shallow in places, it rushes into little falls, but where I found you, it widens to a deep pool, clear as crystal, a haven of refreshment and delight and—holiness. That's what you seem to me tonight—do you understand? Oh, my darling—"

CHAPTER XIII

And so the first winter of the war came to Hamstead. The mail that brought letters from Jaqueline, nursing in a convalescents' home in Brittany; from David, operating in a field hospital directly behind the firing-lines; from Austin, driving his ambulance over shell-shot roads; from Paul, "somewhere in France;" from Jack and Thomas and Philip at Camp Devens—all as yet, unharmed and well.

There was a ball, and a banquet, and "comfort kits" for all the boys. There was the preparation of Christmas packages. There was the careful searching of the newspapers for accounts of the unsatisfactory conditions existing at Camp Devens. . . .

Then, suddenly, the first blow fell.

A telegram came for Blanche.

And Sol Daniels, instead of telephoning it up to the house, as he had telephoned so many times, wrote it down slowly with his stubby pencil, and locking up the station, walked down the road through the deep snow with it in his pocket, blowing his nose hard on his red-bandana handkerchief as he went along.

To his intense relief, it was Mary, who was with her cousin a good deal in those days, who answered the knocker at Carte Blanche. Sol handed the grimy paper to her without a word as she opened the door, and cleared his throat.

"For Blanche?" asked Mary in a startled voice.

"Yes—it's a doggone shame. You better open it first, and then tell her what's in it."

"No—I want it myself, please."

Mary and Sol turned quickly. Blanche was standing on the tiny winding staircase, holding out her hand. She, too, had heard the knocker.

"I've been—been expecting it ever since Philip was home for his furlough. Take Sol in where it's warm, Mary, and give him some coffee. It was awfully kind of you, Sol, to bring it yourself."

"I'd a-rather ben licked than to a-brung it."

"I know—please."

She opened it slowly, almost carefully. It was from one of the doctors, and it was rather long. Philip had been stricken, very suddenly, with pneumonia. The entire illness had been a matter of only thirty-six hours. The doctor was obliged, with the deepest regret, to inform her . . . if she would telegraph her wishes, they would of course, be complied with insofar as possible—

The yellow sheet crackled in her hand. For a moment she shut her eyes, swaying, and Mary started towards her but she put out her hand as if to keep her back. Not even Mary could help her through this moment; she wanted to meet it alone. Then she came slowly down the stairs, and going to the window where the service flag hung, she took it down and stood for a long time with it in her arms, her lips quivering. At last she gathered it up, and crossing the room with it, she hung it, as if it had been an emblem of victory, over the portrait of the little French countess. Then she faced her cousin and her old friend.

"I'll have a new one, with a gold star, in the window," she said quietly, "but that one belongs there. Can you have the express stopped at Hamstead for me, Sol?—You'll go with me, Mary, of course? Please tell mother and Cousin Jane. I'd like to be alone a little while, I think— But I'll be ready to start in an hour."

There was no time to waste in "breaking the news gently." Mary found the two older women together and, without a single unnecessary word, told them what had happened. Violet, horribly stunned and shocked, broke into angry and rebellious grief which prostrated her completely. But when Jane had done all she could to relieve her and the frailer woman had recovered somewhat and they had taken the necessary steps to send Blanche and Mary to bring Philip home and to prepare Hamstead for its first military funeral, Jane went alone to her room and sat a long time, the tears rolling down her grim, plain face, the old candy box tied with red ribbons which Philip had given her long before and which she had kept ever since on her bed-side table near her Bible, clasped in her hands.

"That nice, pleasant, happy boy," she said repeatedly, and added involuntarily, "and he was a real Christian, too, same as Mary said from the first."

Violet, when she had discarded her mourning for her husband, had laid it away in her attic with her usual exquisite neatness, and Mary, unlocking the trunk, brought down the things that Blanche needed and helped her put them on, just as she had helped her dress for her wedding, a year and a half before.

"If I had let him go when he wanted to, this wouldn't have happened."

That was the only complaint she made, the only grief which, so far, she seemed able to voice. But she said it over and over again, after she and Mary were on the train, and the door of the pullman drawing room had been closed, leaving them quiet and alone together.

"Hush, dear! He might have been killed in battle."

"There'd have been some meaning—some compensation—a glory of achievement in that! This was just waste! Hundreds of boys are dying like that—when it could perfectly well have been avoided. They've been almost freezing to death in the camps all over the country."

"I know. I see how you feel. But I don't believe that anything Philip ever did was wasted, just the same."

"If Paul dies, at least it won't be this way."

"No."

"Oh, Mary, how could you let him go the way you did? Supposing he never comes back, either—do you ever think of that?"

Did she ever think of it! Not long before, Mrs. Weston had handed her a letter that had just come from Rosalie King. She had married her floorwalker on a "hurry call" and they had had three days together before he "went across." And that, she had learned, was to be all the honeymoon she would ever have. Mary, taking the letter from Mrs. Weston's limp hand, read it over twice. And she had refused "a week at some quiet place by the sea"—had denied Paul the chance of looking forward to coming back to her "that way." . . . Did she ever think of it!

"Yes, I think of it," she said slowly. "But I had to do what I did, just the same. Even if I'd known he was going to be killed. Paul didn't—didn't love me the way Philip loved you."

"Mary—what do you think it all means? Why do the people who aren't needed, who aren't even wanted, live and live and live? While the ones like Philip—Do you think that it's really punishment for selfishness—not just mine, but—"

"This whole war is a punishment of selfishness—and an atonement for it. Philip is—one of thousands—"

"But my part. That story coming true. And the certainty we both had that it was going to."

Vilas County

COUNTIES, like cities, states and nations, get a great kick out of possessing something unusual to set them apart from other similar communities. Nature, in her benevolence graciously bestowed landscape or other outstanding differences to various counties scattered among our states. In many instances where nature failed to especially endow a county, man has ambitiously come forward and produced some offsetting contribution.

When it comes to lakes, Vilas county, in northern Wisconsin, steps up and proclaims itself "it," modestly hinting that their excellencies, Mr. and Mrs. Public and all the little Publics, take off their hats to her rare and unmatchable collection.

Vilas proudly acclaims that some 1,200 lakes are confined within her wide-flung borders—the smallest, no one knows, the largest perhaps being Trout lake, which is about five miles long by three and one-half miles wide. They run the full gamut of lakedom, in shape and description. Being entirely of glacial origin, they are for the most part limpid sheets of liquid blue or green, basking peacefully in the sun, reflecting quite clearly their timber-lined banks and, needless to say, perhaps, provide refuge for numberless numbers of the finny tribe.

A somewhat unusual feature of these particular lakes is that they are in the main connected by streams navigable for canoes. It being said that one can slip a canoe into the Manitowish river at Boulder Junction, for instance, and by making portages around dams, paddle his way down to the Mississippi river and float out into the Gulf of Mexico.

35 Marshall County Boys Enter Forestry Service

Thirty-five Marshall county young men between the ages of 18 and 25 years, inclusive, left from Warren Friday night for Fort Snelling where they will enter training in preparation for work in the U. S. Government Emergency Relief Forest Camps.

The Marshall county contingent was picked from a group of 50 young men who were requested to report in Warren Friday morning by S. S. Easter, county emergency relief director. An examination was conducted at the Warren high school building and 35 of the number were selected to enter the Forest service.

Seargent Watts of the United States Army Recruiting service arrived here Thursday morning and went over the relief lists with Mr. Easter and was in full charge of making the selection Friday morning.

The boys will receive $30 per month for their services, of which amount $25 each month will be sent home to their parents to provide food and clothes for the coming winter.—Sheaf.

1933 Legislature Cost Money

The 1933 session of the Minnesota legislature cost taxpayers $374,880, or $55,667 less than the 1931 session, according to a tabulation completed by Stafford King, State Auditor. Senate expense totaled $129,465 as compared with $176,328 in 1931. The house of representatives operated at a total expense of $225,415 or $18,814 less than two years ago, when the expense totaled $244,229.

Husby Flays N. D. Governor

Charging that it "evidently was the Governor's intention to close down the dairy department, John Husby, Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor of North Dakota, recently issued a formal statement containing the action of Governor William Langer in vetoing the appropriation for the state dairy department. Only the dairy commissioner's salary escaped the axe.

"Every local and co-operative creamery in this state is jeopardized by this action. Many may be forced to the wall as a result of this veto. When and if this happens, the price of cream in localities where such creameries go out of business will be lower than ever, for the local creamery has been an important factor in holding up the price of butterfat," said one part of Husby's statement which referred to centralizer competition.

WILL END REGULATION

Unless the department can find some othe means of functioning, the statement declares, "there will be no regulation of the milk or cream business in this state for the next biennium and the farmers of this state will continue to be cheated of thousands of dollars rightfully due them."

Citing examples of the need of this inspection work, Commissioner Husby declared that investigations conducted by his department at the request of B. F. Thrailkill, chief of the dairy division of Montana, showed that two North Dakota creameries had stolen 188,000 pounds of butterfat, in the case of the first one, and 72,000 pounds, in the case of the second, from cream delivered from Montana shippers. The thefts, he declared, came in the form of underreading fat tests. He also declared that the record of "one big North Dakota creamery showed an overrun of 49% while another had an overrun of 47%."

SHUTS OFF ACTIVITIES

"As a result of the Governor's veto, the dairy department will be unable to continue the licensing of cream stations, creameries and ice-cream manufacturing institutions after July 1," Husby's statement adds. "It will not be able to have a telephone, send a telegram or even buy a postage stamp. It will not be able to print the blanks for issuing licenses. The entire system which has been built up for the protection of the milk producer has been levelled at one sweep of the Governor's pen."

Let's co-operate in Minnesota so that we won't be in the same predicament as they are in North Dakota. — (Inserted and to be paid by Farmers Coop. Cry. Co.)

"Cyclone Sally" Attracted Fair Sized Audiences

The annual high school play, "Cyclone Sally," which was given at the school auditorium Friday and Saturday night by local high school students, was attended by fair sized but enthusiastic crowds both nights.

This play was conceded to be the best ever presented by the local high school, and credit should be given to the students who participated, as well as those who directed the play.

Hebrew Money

The monetary system of the Hebrews was based upon the Babylonian system of weights. The ratio of the value of gold to silver was 1:13 1-3 and prevailed over all western Asia.

Praise Became Reproach

The word "Hun" was a term of reproach given to the Germans by their enemies from the beginning of the World war. It seems to have first been associated by William II with his army as a term of praise. He used it in an address to his troops about to sail for China from Bremerhaven, July 27, 1900. For many years the German Socialists used the word "Hun" in attacking the militarists in that country.

Feed Variety Important

Variety in the dairy ration is very important. If an animal in good health loses its appetite, the ration usually lacks variety. When several concentrates are included in the ration, there is less danger of a lack of any certain kind of protein or mineral matter than when a smaller number is used. Two kinds of roughage, one a succulent feed and the other a good legume hay, are desirable.

Elmer A. Benson Named State Bank Commissioner

Elmer A. Benson of Appleton, Minn., was on Tuesday of last week appointed state commissioner of banking to succeed John N. Peyton, who has just been appointed chairman of the board of the Minneapolis Federal Reserve Bank and federal reserve agent of the Ninth district.

Mr. Benson is now state commissioner of securities, having been appointed to the post in January by Governor Floyd B. Olson to succeed Charles Gillam.

Mr. Benson prior to his appointment had been cashier for six years of the Farmers and Merchants State Bank of Appleton. At the time Mr. Peyton was appointed banking commissioner, Mr. Benson was discussed for the position.

The announcement of his new appointment was made in Washington by Governor Olson, who has been at the capital for some time in connection with contemplated Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans to the state. Governor Olson said Mr. Benson had been indorsed for the place by the independent bankers of the state.

Middle River Bank To Move

According to an news item in the Argyle Banner, the Farmers State Bank of Middle River has made application for certificate of authority to amend its charter, change its place of business and operate a state bank under the name of the Red Lake County State Bank, at Red Lake Falls.

The hearing on the application to move the bank was scheduled to be held before the Commerce Commission on Tuesday of this week.

The establishment of the bank there is being brought about by the committee from the Red Lake Falls Commercial Club and a number of business men who have signified their willingness to become associated with the new organization by purchasing a limited amount of stock.

Gets $60,000 Verdict

A jury in the supreme court of the District of Colambia recently returned a verdict of $60,000 in favor of Thomas D. Schall, Jr., son and namesake of the junior senator from Minnesota, for injuries suffered in an automobile accident in September, 1930.

The verdict, against the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, was the largest ever returnedin the history of the District of Columbia, attaches of the court said.

The suit grew out of a collission between young Schall's car and a heavy oil truck at West Riverside, Md., eight miles from Washington. Attorneys for the plaintiff were Tom Davis and Ernest Michel of Minneapolis.

Much Interest Is Shown In Fair Prize Awards

Marshall county residents are now in the midst of a big drive for award tickets on prizes which will be given away during the Marshall county fair slated to take place in Warren on June 29, 30 and July 1, according to Wm. Forsberg, president of the fair association and head of the big ticket drive.

Mr. Forsberg was in Holt one day last week and sold tickets to the Holt Cafe, C. H. Gunheim, Carlson Mercantile Co. Inc., and the local newpaper.

Merchants in all sections of the county are showing good cooperation in staging the prize ticket drive, this being the second consecutive year that the fair association will distribute prize awards to visitors at the county fair.

The tickets are being awarded with purchases from merchants participating in awarding the prizes, and everyone is urged to ask their merchant for tickets when making their purchases.

Without a county fair the 4-H clubs would have no place to exhibit their club stock and other projects. We should all pull together and boost for our county fair.

A PLAN

Recently a customer of the bank described a certain farmer in this community with this expression: "He would get rich farming in the Desert of Sahara." Why is this man succeeding when his neighbors fail? He has a plan—uses his head, together with his hands. Everything about the farm is done on a schedule.

His cream checks and other incomes are regularly deposited in this bank. He pays by check. At the end of each month the bank renders a statement. Thus he has a complete record of his income and payments.

May we help you in the same way?

Plan to Rehabilitate Industry Under Government Control; President Asks Congress to Pass Railway Co-ordinator Measure; Farmers Vote National Strike.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

OUR anti-trust laws, that have been held responsible for many of industry's woes in recent times, would be relaxed and ruinous competition and reckless price slashing eliminated under the provisions of a new bill that was laid before President Roosevelt for his approval. This measure, entitled the "National Recovery Act," was drawn up by a committee of congressional and industrial leaders headed by Senator Wagner of New York. Some members of the so-called "brain trust" also had a part in its formulation.

Sen. Wagner

The bill provides for full government control of industries through a federal board that would closely resemble the war industries board of 1918. As summarized by one Washington correspondent, it proposes to set aside the anti-trust laws, the federal trade commission act, and the Clayton act; empowers the national board to designate any industry as one affected with a public interest; permits price fixing directly and wage regulation indirectly under government supervision, and provides for the self-organization of industry through trade associations.

The major features of this bill have been approved by the National Association of Manufacturers and by President H. I. Harriman and other officers of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. It was said that if Mr. Roosevelt liked it, the measure might be offered to congress as a substitute for Secretary of Labor Perkins' bill establishing the 30-hour week and bureaucratic control over production and wage scales of industry. Or it might be combined with the Perkins bill, which was meeting with such decided opposition in the house of representatives that the administration leaders seemed ready to abandon hope of its passage during this session.

This industry bill sets up a board consisting of seven members headed by the secretaries of commerce and labor. The others are to be spokesmen for commerce, finance, labor, agriculture, and the public.

The plan sanctions the formation of industrial and trade associations which shall work with the national board to correlate production with demand, establish prices of commodities at fair levels, and stabilize markets.

WHILE the National Recovery act was still under consideration in the White House, the President in a brief message to congress asked immediate passage of a bill which he hopes will rescue the railroads from their desperate situation. It provides for a federal dictatorship under a "co-ordinator of transportation" whose function it would be to eliminate duplication of services and wasteful methods of operation and to bring about financial reorganizations. This authority is asked for one year, though provision is made for extension of the period by the President.

The President also recommended placing railway holding companies under the jurisdiction of the interstate commerce commission, repeal of the recapture clause of the transportation act whereby half of excess earnings go to the government, liberalizing the basis of rate making and modifying valuation requirements. During the period of emergency control the railroads would be immune from prosecution for violation of the anti-trust laws.

Plans were laid to hurry the measure through congress, and there seemed to be little opposition among either Republicans or Democrats.

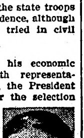
MR. ROOSEVELT, addressing the Chamber of Commerce of the United States at its annual dinner, sought to dissipate the fears of business men that he was trying to bring about a bureaucratic control of industry, intimating that this would not come about if industry granted three requests which he set forth. These were that wages should go no lower and should rise just as fast as industry improves; that business should help the government to end cut-throat competition and unfair practices, and that leaders should work for national recovery, not for the selfish gain of a single industry or trade.

THOUGH the house accepted the inflation rider to the farm bill, it did not agree to the senate's amendment authorizing the secretary of agriculture to set arbitrary prices for basic agricultural commodities and penalize sales below such prices, and final enactment of the measure was thus delayed. This difference of opinion also led the farmers' convention in Des Moines to order a farm holiday beginning May 13, the producers being instructed to keep their products off the market during the period of the strike in order to starve the nation into complying with their demands. Eggs, vegetables and milk are included with the other farm products.

This action was taken by some 1,500 delegates from twenty-one states. Observers said they represented only about 1 per cent of the farmer strength in their respective states and predicted the strike would be ineffective.

The convention adopted resolutions of sympathy with the farmers of two counties in Iowa which are under martial law because of the disgraceful mobbing of Judge C. C. Bradley at Le Mars. Many of the mob leaders were under arrest and the state troops were used to gather evidence, although the cases were to be tried in civil court.

WHILE continuing his economic conversations with representatives of other nations, the President found time to consider the selection of American delegates to the world conference that opens June 12 in London. He consulted with Assistant Secretary of State Raymond Moley, who will be one of the delegates, and also was visited by Henry Morgenthau, Sr., former ambassador to Turkey, and James M. Cox of Ohio, Democratic Presidential candidate in 1920. Both those gentlemen, it was understood, were to go to London; and Mr. Morgenthau also was chosen to represent the United States at the international wheat conference in Geneva.



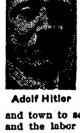
Henry Morgenthau, Sr.

To the organization committee for the London conference Norman H. Davis, special American envoy, proposed that the nations should enter into an agreement for a world-wide tariff truce pending the outcome of the parley. Putting this on the agenda was left up to Prime Minister MacDonald, who returned home to confront a difficult situation. While he was talking international trade agreements with Mr. Roosevelt, the British board of trade under President Walter Runciman was promoting bilateral trade understandings with many governments.

MR. ROOSEVELT had a round of conversations with Latin-American diplomats, starting with Thomas Le Breton of Argentina who was accompanied to the White House by Ambassador Espil. Doctor Le Breton and his corps of experts also met with Secretary of Agriculture Wallace and other government officials to discuss monetary and trade problems and especially methods of controlling world surpluses of wheat.

Guido Jung, Italy's finance minister, arrived in Washington and at once began talks with President Roosevelt and his advisers concerning the purely economic and monetary phases of the current questions; and Augusto Rosso, Italian ambassador, handled for his government the discussion of disarmament and political matters.

MOVING along somewhat similar lines to those of the Roosevelt administration, Chancellor Adolf Hitler was going a swifter pace than any of his fellow dictators ever held. Immediately after a May day announcement that he would draft the youth of Germany into a labor army, regardless of wealth and position, he proceeded to destroy the free trade unions of the nation. The Nazi storm troops were sent into every city and town to seize the union premises and the labor banks. All the important union leaders were put under arrest.



Adolf Hitler

"This clears the path for the new National Socialist state in which labor will form a part of society, divided and grouped according to professions," said Dr. Robert Ley, Nazi president of the states' council, who directed the raids. "Guilds like those of the Middle ages will be formed."

Hitler's next move, with only a day's interval, was to assume control of the Central Association of German Banks and Banking Industry, reorganize the board of directors, appoint a Nazi liaison official and take steps for a general reduction in interest rates.

There was no let up in the Nazi campaign against the Jews. Bernhard Rust, the Prussian minister of education, dismissed twenty-one professors from Berlin university and nine from Cologne university. Among them were some of the foremost scholars and scientists of the country.

UNCLE SAM is now authorized to go into the power business, for the senate by a vote of 63 to 20 passed the Norris bill for the development and operation of the Muscle Shoals project. The house had passed an almost identical measure so there was little adjusting to be done before the bill was sent to the President for signature.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has selected Sam G. Bratton of New Mexico for a federal judgeship in the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals, which embraces New Mexico, Colorado, Oklahoma, Kansas, Wyoming and Utah. Bratton accepted but will not resign from the senate until the special session ends.

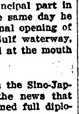
W. A. Julian of Ohio has accepted the post of treasurer of the United States, and Dean G. Acheson of Connecticut is to be undersecretary of the treasury.

OPENING date for Chicago's Century of Progress exposition was advanced to May 27 to accommodate President Roosevelt, who promised to be on hand to take principal part in the ceremonies. On the same day he will officiate at the formal opening of the Great-Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, the ceremony to be held at the mouth of the Chicago river.

OF GREAT import in the Sino-Japanese quarrel is the news that Soviet Russia has resumed full diplomatic relations with the Chinese Nationalist government. Dimitri Bogomoloff, the new ambassador from Moscow, presented his credentials at Nanking. Immediately the Chinese press began a vigorous campaign looking toward an alliance with the Soviet government similar to the one that followed the war with Japan in 1895, when China virtually ceded Liaotung peninsula, part of Manchuria, to Russia in return for assistance against Japan.

The Chinese now suggest that China grant the Soviets important trade privileges to provide an outlet for Soviet goods in China and at the same time exclude Japanese products. In exchange it is hoped that Russia would actively help China in connection with the Manchukuo conflict.

GERMANY has proposed to the disarmament conference in Geneva, through her representative, Count Rudolf Nadolny, that the arms plan offered by the British be altered to provide a maximum caliber of 105 millimeters for mobile guns and to entirely abolish tanks. Nadolny contended that if these proposals were rejected, Germany should be allowed to have all land, naval and air armaments that other nations deemed necessary for their adequate defense.



Count Nadolny.

"The German government has sufficiently proved its good will," he said. "We have accepted in principle the period of transition for the practical realization of full equality rights for Germany. This proves there is absolutely no foundation for the opinion that Germany wishes to avail herself of disarmament to proceed with her own re-armament at the highest possible level. The contrary is the case."

Count Nadolny won a victory when the committee on armies voted not to include in the armed strength of Germany the 60,000 Nazi storm troops. The decision was reached by a vote of 7 to 6.

HOARDERS of gold in large numbers have defied the treasury, refused to turn in their stores of the yellow metal in exchange for other currency, and challenged the authority of the government to coerce them or to punish them for their stand. Among those who are holding large supplies of gold in safety deposit boxes are many foreigners, both resident and nonresident. All requests for licenses to export this gold are refused by the treasury, unless it is earmarked for foreign governments, central banks or the Bank of International Settlements.

In addition to the foreign gold owners there are many domestic holders of gold with large amounts in safety deposit vaults. Some are known to the treasury and were said to have several million dollars in gold coin. According to the information, they declined to surrender the gold on the advice of attorneys, who planned to test the law in the courts.

Indications pointed to a test case within a short time. The Department of Justice probably will arrange to expedite the case so that a prompt decision may be obtained from the Supreme court.

ONE more head of a Latin-American government has fallen at the hand of an assassin. Luis M. Sancho Cerro, President of Peru, was shot to death by Abelardo de Mendoza, a member of the Aprista, opposition party, just after reviewing 20,000 conscripts in training for the war with Colombia. Mendoza was slain by the Presidential guards. The Peruvian congress named Gen. Oscar Benevides as temporary president.

ASSUMING the correctness of meager dispatches from Cuba, a real rebellion against the Machado regime has broken out with the landing of two expeditions near the eastern end of the island. The government claimed to be having an easy time suppressing the outbreak, but the fighting continued. Some of Machado's opponents more than intimated that the revolt was a "set up" engineered by the President himself.

UNITED States District Judge George A. Carpenter of Chicago sent to the President his resignation, effective June 30, saying that he "feels the ravages of time" and at his age, which is sixty-six, is disinclined to carry out the daily routine of judicial work. Judge Carpenter has been on the district bench for 23 years.

Reversal of Powers

Washington.—In all of the hustle and bustle of getting things done in this crisis, it seems to me that one of the greatest transformations of all time has taken place. I refer to the reversal of powers that are exercised by congress and the Chief Executive. Actually, in the period of a little over two months, or since Franklin D. Roosevelt became President, congress has abdicated much power in favor of the President and the President, in turn, has given to congress a veto power which it never has had before.

It will be recalled that the Constitution prescribes the limits of authority of the legislative, executive and judicial branches of our government. Congress was supposed to be the check on the executive powers just as the President, through the exercise of a veto on legislation, was to be the check on acts of the national legislature. The courts, or the Supreme court of the United States, were given a whip hand over both.

The circumstances of it all are so important and the procedure so unique that a review of the period probably is necessary to set out the picture. Further, there is no doubt in the minds of many authorities and many students of government that the things which have happened are going to affect the future of this nation vitally and in ways of which we do not dream. From the perspective of the present, it is made to appear that they could not have happened except for the crisis through which the nation, and the world, has passed. Yet it remains as fact that congress has turned over to President Roosevelt authority which it may recall to itself only with the greatest difficulty.

Epochal Events

Chronologically, events have transpired something in this order:

The President took office as the banking structure of the nation was crumbling. He acted without delay, and then asked congress to support his hand with the legislation that was necessary. Congress had no choice. It voted the emergency banking bill through in record time. That legislation would have taken years otherwise to have been enacted. But congress was scared!

Next came the authority for reorganization of the government. It was put through quickly because everybody in congress wanted to save money and balance the budget. Also, most members of congress saw a nice sideroad which they could travel and avoid meeting face to face with the question of reducing the payment to veterans. They did not fancy cutting government salaries, either. So they thought it was fine to "let Franklin do it." He acted promptly and with neatness, saving probably more than four hundred millions a year in what he believed to be unwarranted payments to veterans and one-fourth as much more in other ways.

It was in this legislation as well as in the banking act that congress began to give away its control. The statement can fairly be made that the bulk of house and senate members had no comprehension of what was done by the banking act, but the same cannot be said of the reorganization act. That was simple legislation. It said in plain language that the President could make about any changes in the structure of the government which he deemed advisable. He was to do it by executive order and if congress had not acted affirmatively in a prescribed time, the executive order stood as law.

To those unacquainted with the procedure, the reversal of practice may not be so apparent. But after congress had delegated that authority to the President, it can stop his action only by a two-thirds vote. That is difficult to obtain except in an emergency.

Veto Power of Congress

Assume, for an illustration, that congress is dissatisfied with some move made by the President in connection with reorganization and it passes a resolution setting aside that particular executive order. Mere passage of the resolution does not make it the law of the land, for there is yet the signature of the President to be obtained. If the President chose to veto the resolution, the congress then to make its will effective must repass that resolution by a majority of two-thirds. It thus exercises veto power, something hitherto unknown.

Now, as to the banking act: the President was given broad discretionary power to reconstruct the banking system. True, it was an emergency, a crisis. But that legislation went so far as to permit the Chief Executive to take over and operate the federal reserve banks. By that means, it is not beyond a stretch of imagination that he actually can control the commercial banks of the country. The tie-up between the federal reserve banks and the privately owned commercial banks is so close that control of the one opens hundreds of avenues by which the other may be reached.

Congress can withdraw that power by repealing the legislation. It is supreme in that field. Yet, in order to repeal the law, the repealer must be signed by the President.

Along came the farm bill to which was added the inflation amendment presented by Senator Thomas of Oklahoma. No more dictatorial power ever was accorded the head of any government, except the absolute monarchy, than is given to the President of our country. In the farm bill itself there is power to control crop production, a power to restrict acreage, if the Chief Executive wants to go that far.

In the Thomas inflation amendment, the authority is given the Chief Executive to change the value of your money and mine, at whatever time he sees fit. He can make the gold dollar worth half what it was heretofore; he can use silver to an extent he deems necessary, and he appears to have been given power to arrange treaties on monetary standards without even consulting again with the congress. It had always been supposed that the Constitution required the advice and consent of the senate on treaties, but the authority now apparently rests in the hands of the Chief Executive alone.

Between the banking legislation and the farm bill, with its inflation section, congress voted the President the right to organize a new "army" of upwards of 250,000 men. The reforestation bill that became law called for the mobilization of a "citizen's conservation corps," a legitimate peace-time organization for the purpose of re-establishing a source of timber supply. Mr. Roosevelt was given wide discretion as to how that corps would be recruited, trained and used. It is a matter clear out of the hands of congress.

Others are yet to come. Among them is the railroad legislation that is now shaping up. The President can become monarch of the rail systems through the federal co-ordinator for which the legislation provides.

Powers in Better Hands

One hears a good deal of discussion in Washington respecting the powers which the President has been given. Generally speaking, the conclusion is that they are in better hands than if they remained with congress under the present circumstance. The President has demonstrated that he knows what he wants, and most members of congress are afraid to deny requests which he makes.

Take the inflation amendment for example. Mr. Roosevelt undoubtedly saw a tidal wave of inflation sentiment in congress. It was there. So in order to maintain control, he placed himself at the head of the inflation parade. It is unthinkable that he will ever use all of the various powers given him in the inflation amendment, for he knows that the remedy would be worse than the disease they seek to cure in most instances. But by the simple expedient of inviting the inflationists to dump all of their remedies into one basket and to give him discretionary power to use them as he desires, he continued to command the forces. I have heard it suggested frequently that many of the inflationists do not realize yet how they let the thing get away from them.

And it did get away. Having made the means available once, there are not so many senators and representatives who will vote to make it mandatory now. If they did, the President could veto the bills and there seems little chance of enough votes to pass that sort of thing over the veto of the Chief Executive.

Keeps Them Guessing

Observers here used to think that Calvin Coolidge kept the politicians in congress "up in the air" by the manner in which he outguessed them. The judgment now is that Roosevelt has improved on the Coolidge plan to the point where his plans take on elements of mystery. The action in the case of the inflation ghost is typical. It was wholly unexpected. He keeps things to himself until his mind is made up. Then, without further ado a brief message goes to congress and the thing is done. The method has proved immensely practical as well as effective. Whether the results are right or wrong is not within the realm of my discussion.

Senator Robinson, of Arkansas, the Democratic leader in the senate, continues to have his troubles in keeping Senator Huey Long, of Louisiana, on the party reservation. Senator Long, the self-styled kingfish, just won't stand hitched. Consequently, clashes between Robinson and the kingfish are frequent since the Democratic leader is equipped with a vicious tongue and more than the average amount of courage.

The kingfish does more talking than any other senator. It irks Robinson to see his plans upset as the kingfish frequently upsets them by his long, rambling speeches into which he sprinkles numerous quotations from the Bible.

DEPRESSION BRINGS IDEA

The idea that the world depression might be cured by making Chinamen's shirts an inch longer has been brought out in a new phase by a politician of Nanking, China. He proposes to introduce laws which will compel women's "limbs" to be "properly covered." This will mean long skirts and sleeves in all gowns, thus requiring more cloth made by local textile mills. The politician advocates men's suits modeled "more or less" on European styles, except that they would be buttoned up to the neck. Women's clubs may be expected to rise in protest against the long-skirt idea.

—15—

"I don't understand that either, of course. But I do know that some of the things we've always spoken of as 'supernatural' seem to occur much more frequently since the war, or else people are not so ashamed or so afraid to speak about them as they used to be. I believe the body and the spirit are in some way much more closely interwoven than we've realized. That's one reason why we must try so hard to make the one worthy of the other."

"I've always known they were closely interwoven in Philip. Oh, Mary, will—will he be much changed, do you think?"

He was not. He looked, indeed, so serene, so supremely happy, that Blanche, kneeling beside him, burst, for the first time, into healing tears. And the nurse who had taken care of him told her that he had suffered very little.

"It was all so quick," she said. "He simply wouldn't let us send for you, and we really didn't think it was necessary—until it was too late. He said you must be saved all the grief and care you could. He'd just had a letter—"

"He got it in time so that he could read it?" asked Blanche, with such a sudden leap of joy in her voice that Mary wondered instantly what had been in that special letter.

"Oh yes. He was awfully happy over it, that was plain to see, and now that I've met you, Mrs. Starr, I don't wonder he wanted to save a lovely child like you from all the anxiety he could. He didn't suffer much, honestly. And just before he died—but I don't know as I ought to tell you—"

"You must—"

"Something strange happened."

"Yes," said Blanche breathlessly, looking from the nurse to Mary.

"He had been having some trouble with his breathing. He was unconscious for a little while, I thought, and delirious, off and on. Suddenly he opened his eyes and looked toward the foot of the bed, smiling as if he saw something there that pleased him. Then he turned to me and said, 'You did send for my wife, after all, didn't you?' I told him no, that we'd done just as he wanted about everything. He looked kind of puzzled and went on, 'But she's standing there with her arms stretched out, dressed all in white. She looks exactly as she did the last night we had together—the first night I really found her.'"

Blanche laid her cheek against the quiet hand lying on the spread.

"Go on," she said, after a moment.

"I was stupid enough to look there myself, for he kind of startled me. But of course there was nothing. So I shook my head, and said not to worry, that everything was all right. The puzzled expression faded, gradually, and he smiled again. And then he spoke just as if he was talking to someone."

"What did he say?"

"'So you've come, little countess. But you mustn't ever come to anyone again. This must be the last time, And I'm not sorry. It's all been so perfect—so perfect, while it lasted.'—Do you know what flashed into my mind, I don't know why? There wasn't any real connection!—That line about a 'full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice—'"

That was, blessedly, what it seemed to Blanche. Even in her first grief, she found, after all, the compensation, the "glory of achievement" that she thought she had been denied. She did not ask, she did not need, any longer, to understand. She needed only to feel, and as soon as her mental and physical exhaustion left her, to work.

She worked all the rest of the winter, and the next summer, and every woman in Hamstead worked with her. France, with its thousands of widows, was three thousand miles away, but Blanche was in their midst. Through her they reached out and found those others—

When fall came, she was not working any longer, but the rest of Hamstead, thinking of her, worked harder than ever. For she was lying very still and happy, in the big four-poster bed in the soft-colored chamber of Carte Blanche, with the golden, downy head of Philip Starr's son against her breast.

CHAPTER XIV

Moses and Algy Manning were coming home from school together. They had, in three years, grown noticeably taller and thinner. Their faces, as usual, would have been improved by the ministrations of a handkerchief and a wash-cloth. But Gale Hamlin, who had been riding for some hours over roads that not infrequently caused him to strike the top of the car or skid into a ditch, leaned out of the window and hailed them with delight as he caught sight of them.

"Stop a minute, Morrison— Hello, you kids! Climb in here. Going home from school?"

"Yes," replied the two small boys together, accepting his invitation with alacrity, and seating themselves beside him without further waste of words.

"Getting along pretty well?"

"Fine," answered Moses. "Algy's in kindergarten. I'm in the second grade."

"Good for you! Can you write your name yet?"

"Write my name!" exclaimed Moses, with injured pride. "I kin write poems!"

Gale Hamlin coughed. "No, really?" he asked politely. "If you can, fame and fortune await you. Unfortunately, there are so many young gentlemen who only think they can. They can't, really."

"I'll show you," said Moses, who did not understand the greater part of this speech but felt it, on the whole, unimportant whether he did or not. Removing the cover from his dinner-pail, and depositing on the seat beside him two apple cores, half a doughnut, a package of gum, a yard or so of twine, a jackknife and a Second Reader, he finally pulled out a piece of blue paper on the outside of which was written in large letters, "Two Poimes. By M. Manning," and handed them to the doubting Thomas in triumph.

"Ther was a bee and—" read Gale,
"He sat on a tree and
He herd a sound
And he made a bownd
At the sound.
So that's all so call."

"Go on," said Moses, without false modesty.

"There was a workman
Who carried a can
And his name was Smiller
And he went to the miller
And sat on a piller
And thats all ther was herd
Of Mr. Smiller."

"You should try the Atlantic Monthly," said Gale, folding and returning the paper. "But if that isn't appreciative, there are several other magazines. I will give you a list, if you like, or I will undertake to place these for you myself, for a small commission."

"I guess so," said Moses, feeling again that he was missing the point somewhere. "I showed 'em to Mary and she laughed and told me to take 'em to school and let my teacher see 'em."

"How is Mary?" Gale asked.

"Well, she looks kinder peaked. Was you thinkin' of comin' to say good-by to her?"

"Something of that sort. Why?"

"Because," replied Moses, "I wouldn't, if I was you. Thomas Gray tried it, and he wasn't suited at all. With the way she said good-by, I mean."

"Moses and I were under the sofa, playing lion, only Mary and Thomas didn't know it," said Algy, in an illuminating aside.

"She shook hands, nice and polite, like she's taught us to do it," continued Moses. "I don't know what more was wanted. But there was something. He said so."

"Twice," volunteered Algy.

"And then he said, 'Mary, isn't there any chance for me at all?' and she said, 'No, I'm sorry, but there isn't.'"

"And Thomas," continued the faithful chorus, "said, 'Wasn't there ever any chance for anyone except Paul?' and Mary stiffened up and said, 'Paul threw his chance away.'"

"What happened next?" asked Gale, feeling very much as if he had been eavesdropping himself.

"Thomas spoke right up as if he was kinder mad. 'Well,' he said, 'are you goin' on rememberin' that all the rest of your life, 'stead of that he tried good and hard and plenty to find it again?'"

"Ah!" remarked Gale.

"And then Mary told him she couldn't discuss it with him. He was home just for a few hours, before he went to France. That was most a year ago. No one's tried it on her since."

"Suppose," said Gale, producing a crisp dollar bill, "that you boys go to Wallacetown with Morrison and have a spree? You might enjoy it and I—er—wouldn't run the risk of having any lions under the sofa while I was there!"

Mary was very glad to see Gale Hamlin, and she did not attempt to disguise the fact. He told her a good deal of Boston news that pleased and interested her, while he drank the tea and ate the cookies that she brought him, before he asked her any questions. "How is Mrs. Starr? I want to see her, too!"

"Oh, she's wonderful! So well, and so busy, and so happy with the baby! He's the loveliest little creature! Cousin Jane worships him, too. You must see him before you go. He isn't like a Manning at all—he's the image of his father."

"I am very glad she has him. Does she have good news of her brother, too?"

"She doesn't have any."

Gale did not answer immediately.

"I'm sorry if I've made a stupid mistake," he said at last. "You didn't mention any bad news, the last time you were in Boston."

"No—I don't often talk about Paul."

"So I have observed," remarked Gale dryly.

Mary flared instantly. "Men are not fair to women," she said bitterly.

"I'm sorry to say that's often true. But it's no reason why women shouldn't be fair to men. Two wrongs never made a right, you know."

"Are you trying to tell me what is right for me to do?"

"I'm trying to tell you what is wrong. It would be wicked if you never married."

"Wicked!"

"For you—not for every woman."

"Why for me especially?"

"You ought to guess. And I've seen you with men— I know how much charm you have, no matter how you try to hide it and how much power, no matter how little you choose to use it. And I've seen you with children—your patience and your wisdom and your loving kindness. Philip Starr has done wonderful things for the place—and the woman—he loved—by his death. But they're nothing to what you can do for the place and the man you may love—by your life—if you only will."

The girl rose suddenly and turned away from him. Gale crossed to her quickly, and put his hand on her shoulder.

"So you refused Thomas Gray?" he asked quietly.

"Yes. There was never any question of Thomas."

"Or of me?"

"Yes, there was some question of you. I thought you knew that."

"Will—could you answer it any differently now?"

"No."

"Or ever, do you think?"

"No. I—I'm sure I never could."

"Then how are you going to answer Paul when he comes home?"

"Paul isn't ever coming home," said Mary steadily—so steadily, in fact, that a man who knew her less well than Gale Hamlin did would have been completely deceived by her tone.

"What happened, Mary?" he asked gently. "Please tell me."

"He was wounded last May," she said in a hard voice. "Not seriously. Cousin Violet had a letter, written by Paul himself in the hospital, saying the wound was just a scratch—that he'd be out again for the next 'big scrap.'"

"Yes."

"He was. He was at Belleau Wood and Chateau-Thierry. Then he was listed as 'Prisoner or Missing.' We haven't heard since. That was nine months ago."

"Yes."

"There were very few marines taken prisoner. We thought, after the armistice was signed, we'd have some word."

"And you haven't?"

"No—not a syllable. We hope—I hope, anyway—that he was killed. It would be much less horrible—than the other." Then with a swift change of tone, she exclaimed, "Don't you ever read the Casualty lists yourself? Oh, I believe you knew all the time!"

"Yes—I did. But I wanted you to tell me yourself. I've been waiting, ever since last summer, to see if you wouldn't. I wanted to know just how you felt about it."

"Do you know now?"

"I think I do—Mary, don't you ever bend?"

"Bend?"

"Yes—because if you don't, I'm afraid some day you're going to break. You did, very nearly, you know, once before. You remember the old fable—"

"I have been doing what I could," Gale went on, as Mary did not answer, "to locate your cousin ever since I found out the situation. But, so far, I haven't discovered anything. Now, however, I'm starting for Europe myself—almost immediately. Until now, it has seemed as if I could be most useful here. I am glad that at last there appear to be ways in which I can help over there—reconstruction, investigation—I don't need to tell you— There, my dear, there—"

He waited patiently for the storm to pass, stroking very gently the soft hair about the hidden face. He waited, it seemed to him, endlessly. For Mary was weeping with the abandonment, the utter hopelessness, that marks the ultimate despair of those strong souls whose fortitude enables them to restrain their grief until it reaches its culmination, and the shattering of whose spirit is all the more tragic because it is so sudden. Gale Hamlin's heart twisted in his breast at the sight of her unrestraint and the thought of her agony. He knew he was powerless to help her except by surrounding her with the sense of his infinite compassion. It was a long time before she raised her head, and as she did so, still far from composed, the door was flung unceremoniously open and Algy and Moses entered noisily.

"The dollar's all spent," announced Moses.

"Well," said Gale, with a slight sigh, "it lasted just about long enough. I rather wish, though, I had given you a dollar and a half! Will you take me over and introduce me to your new little cousin?"

* * * * * * *

Mrs. Elliott, who was "passing the afternoon" with Violet, saw him walk down the cobblestone path with a small boy on either side of him, from her point of vantage in the North Parlor window. Violet did not receive her callers in the kitchen, like Mrs. Gray. She did not consider it "select" to do so.

"Look here, Violet," called Mrs. Elliott excitedly, "if there ain't Mr. Hamlin comin' down Seth's front walk! He don't take 'no' for an answer very easy, does he?"

"No," said Violet, "and Mary doesn't say 'yes' very easily, either. I can't think what that girl's made of. She used to be always laughing and singing, but now-a-days she's so glum—except with the children—that you can hardly get a word out of her, and you can't ask her the most trivial question that she doesn't lose her temper. And she's never shown the slightest feeling about Paul!"

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

News of Minnesota
EVENTS of the week throughout the "State of Ten Thousand Lakes" told in brief form

Cottonwood—Five bags of mail were stolen from the depot here, but most of it was recovered.

Clearbrook—One hundred crows were killed in the annual crow hunt by 30 Clearbrook sportsmen.

Minneapolis—During the first two days of the opening of the dog licensing department over 1,200 licenses were purchased.

Madison—Four bandits raided the Klein National bank, robbed it of $2,000 slugged an employee and shot down three citizens

Moose Lake—Construction of a municipal electric plant, sought for by residents for the last several years, will start this summer.

Fort Snelling—The first pay-day for the forest workers in training here, was received from Washington. $9,000 was paid out to the families of the men in camp.

Le Sueur—Arrest of Clayton Weiss, city treasurer of Le Sueur for seven years, on a charge of embezzling $11,099 was disclosed by Edward J. Gamble, Le Sueur county attorney.

Litchfield—Willmar and Bird Island high school musicians won first places in the annual district music contest in which 400 pupils from 14 central Minnesota towns competed here.

Mankato—Representatives of 60 southern Minnesota courts of the Catholic Order of Foresters helped St. Joseph Court No. 552 observe the fiftieth and anniversary of the order.

Minneapolis—Less than four weeks before her eighty-fourth birthday, Harriet Godfrey, first white child born in the village of St. Anthony, now a part of Minneapolis, applied to Hennepin county commissioners for an old age pension.

Minneapolis—A thorough investigation of the mysterious death of Ralph Cecil Roberts, 41-year-old construction engineer of St. James, Minn., was asked of police by the Hennepin County coroner's office. Roberts was found dead with a cracked skull.

St. Cloud—Six persons escaped and one woman burned to death when an automobile crashed into a guard rail, turned over and caught fire. The victim, Mrs. Nathan Walter, 62 years old, of Foley, perished despite the desperate efforts of the six survivors.

Minneapolis—Beer of not more than 3.2 alcoholic content may be sent through the mails legally, so long as it is addressed to states or territories in which its sale or manufacture has been legalized, Postmaster General James Farley informed the local office.

Brainerd—The newly formed Pelican Lake Association hopes to obtain the raising of the water level of Big Pelican lake by means of a dam and diversion channel from Pelican brook. The first problem to be solved is that of proper engineering to make a complete survey of the Pelican lake area.

Steen—More than 200 head of livestock were maimed and had to be destroyed when 14 cars of a stock train were derailed near here. A defective truck on a refrigerator car was believed responsible. The train which left Sioux Falls carried cattle and hogs for Chicago and New York packers.

Minneapolis—Twenty-five hundred musicians and 3,000 representatives of music clubs of America will be in Minneapolis the week of May 21 to 28 to take part in the American Music festival which will be held in connection with the biennial convention of the National Federation of Music clubs.

St. Paul—Governor Olson, named four new regents for the University of Minnesota, creating a strong liberal group on that board. They are: George W. Lawson, St. Paul, Secretary of the Minnesota Federation of Labor; Frank W. Murphy, Wheaton, attorney, and veteran leader in farm relief campaigns; Dr. A. E. Olson, Duluth, and Mrs. Anna Olson Determan, Litchfield, who has been a farmer-labor candidate for state office.

Fort Snelling—Enrollment of Minnesota's second increment in the civilian conservation corps as part of the federal unemployment relief program is under way in various parts of the state as the state's quota of 1,400 men in this increment was allotted among the counties. These 1,400 are in addition to the 600 previously enrolled from Minneapolis and St. Paul and now nearly ready to leave Fort Snelling for the northern Minnesota national forests.

St. Paul—The legislature really did something about economy, it developed when State Auditor Stafford King compiled the record of legislative costs. The session cost $55,677 less than the 1931 session, and the senate accounted for $46,863 of that saving. The house did not do so well. It talked big at the start of the savings to be made, but ended with a total bill of $225,415, which was $18,814 less than two years ago. The total cost was $374,880, the record shows. Payrolls showed reductions from 1931 to effect the saving.

Radio and Phone Link the Nations

Distances and Difficulties of Travel Are No Longer Important.

The recent opening of a radio telephone service between the United States and Colombia marks another link in the vast chain of communications emanating from this city, says the New York Times. Residents of New York can now reach 33,500,000 individual telephones, or 92 per cent of all those in the world, located in forty-six countries.

In Europe nearly every country is part of the communication chain, which extends from North Cape to the Mediterranean, from Brittany to the Black sea. Such small nations as Latvia and Estonia, larger countries such as Poland and Czechoslovakia, and island groups such as the Canary and Balearic isles, can be connected to New York telephones. Greece cannot be reached. The U. S. S. R. recently announced the projected opening of a direct telephone service from Moscow to New York via Berlin and London. This service is now in an experimental stage.

Only one country on the mainland of Asia—Siam—can now be reached by telephone from New York, although further service is projected by way of San Francisco and Hawaii. The New York-Siam connection is by way of radio telephone to London, thence by cable to Berlin, and from there via short-wave radio to Bangkok.

Java can be reached, and about a year ago connection was made to the island of Sumatra in the East Indies. Calls to these islands travel by the regular transatlantic radio telephone circuits to London, thence by wire to Amsterdam or Berlin, and from there by radio to Bandoeng in Java. Another short-wave radio circuit links Bandoeng with Medan in Sumatra.

The northern and southern parts of Africa can be reached by the telephone user in New York. Cairo and Alexandria in Egypt are connected with London. Cape Town was linked a few months ago with New York via London, a distance of about 9,500 miles. The South African service also includes De Aar, Port Elizabeth and nearby ports.

Progress has been made in the past year in connecting South American countries with telephone from New York; Peru and Venezuela having been added. The New York business man may also telephone to Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Uruguay.

Central America will soon be joined to the chain of telephone communication with service including Panama, the Canal zone, Honduras, Nicaragua and Guatemala. Cuba is now reached by undersea cable, while Bermuda and Bahamas have radio telephone service.

Hawaii can be reached by radio telephone, while probably the longest distance the New Yorker can phone is to Australia, by way of Cupar, Scotland, London and Sydney, about 14,000 miles.

Modern invention has now also made it possible for the New York resident to telephone to fourteen ocean liners equipped with the proper apparatus.

ACID STOMACH EASY NOW TO CORRECT

Just Do One Thing—That's All

According to many authorities, some 80% of the people of today have acid stomach. This because so many foods, comprising the modern diet, are acid forming foods.

It usually makes itself felt in sour stomach, indigestion, headaches, nausea, "gas," "biliousness," and most frequently in stomach pains that come about thirty minutes after eating. So you can easily tell if you have it.

Now Quickly and Easily Corrected

If you do have acid stomach, don't worry about it. You can correct it in a very simple manner. Just do this. It will alkalize your acid soaked stomach almost immediately. You will feel like another person.

TAKE—2 teaspoonfuls of Phillips' Milk of Magnesia with a glass of water every morning when you get up. Take another teaspoonful thirty minutes after eating. And another before you go to bed.

What This Does

That's all you do. But you do it regularly, EVERY DAY, so long as you have any symptoms of distress.

This acts to neutralize the stomach acids that foster your "upset" stomach, that invite headaches and that feeling of lassitude and lost energy.

Try it. Results will amaze you. Your head will be clear. You'll forget you have a stomach.

BUT—be careful that you get REAL milk of magnesia when you buy; genuine PHILLIPS' Milk of Magnesia. See that the name "Phillips" is stamped clearly on the label.

ALSO IN TABLET FORM: Phillips' Milk of Magnesia Tablets are now on sale at drug stores everywhere. Each tiny tablet is the equivalent of a teaspoonful of Genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia.

OUR BIG Department Store

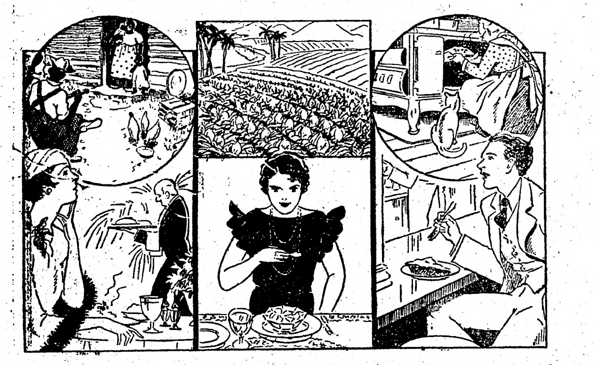
The stores of our town, as a whole, are but the big department store of the metropolitan center. Collectively they offer every trading advantage enjoyed by the people of the large cities. The only difference is that all departments are not under one roof nor one ownership. The variety is here, the convenience is here, the reliability is here and you can always have plenty of time to investigate your purchases. Take advantage of the service of our local merchants.

Trade at Home.

YOUR MIND'S EYE



WE eat with our eyes—that theory has been pretty generally accepted, and food dealers everywhere have acted on this theory by making their foods as tempting to the eye as possible. Now comes another interesting theory—we eat with our mind's eye.

Did you ever witness a woman from the South contentedly eating sweet potatoes in a hotel, say, up North? If you were to tell her she was eating a memory, she would flatly deny it—absurd. Actually, however, she is eating only a memory of yellow yams that ripened down in North Carolina or Georgia fields where long summers slowly ripened them to a golden color and a soft, sugary consistency; where Southern cooks baked them slowly in the oven until they were mealy and delectable and served them piping hot with sweet country butter.

Take Oysters

You like oysters on the half-shell, don't you? Can you remember when, as a child, you looked suspiciously at these peculiar creatures and regarded people who swallowed them as somewhat inhuman? And then, when you attained the age of banquets, you met these same bivalves, perhaps at a high school affair, and they were smugly embedded in ice and encircled a sophisticated little glass of cocktail sauce. You decided they were "hot stuff," and you still think so.

And finally, consider the case of the large male population who eat baker's pies—we refer to the sort that tumble out of big trucks on trays and are stacked up on counters—because somewhere, at some time, someone baked flaky, buttery pies stuffed with juicy, spicy fruits or sweet fillings which melted in your mouth.

Not a Memory

If you know something of the methods of food canning and the growing of these foods, you know that in the case of canned foods, you are eating not a memory of good foods, but actually these same foods, which could come to you fresh no other way than in cans. For example, the tender, fully-ripened grapefruit that you buy in cans is actually that same grapefruit which you saw ripening in the sunshine in Florida, and it has been picked—not green, for shipping—but in the full bloom of its growth. And when you eat it, your mind's eye sees again those rows and rows of small symmetrical trees, groves of which afford such a charming vista as you travel over the winding country roads.

If you have lived out on a Missouri farm, where cornfields wave their yellow tassels in the breeze to proudly proclaim that corn is golden ripe, and still tender and succulent, you get something of the thrill of things growing in the "good earth"—and you get this same thrill when you eat the juicy, ripe kernels of canned corn, because you know the canner like the farmer had "the water boiling while the corn is being picked."

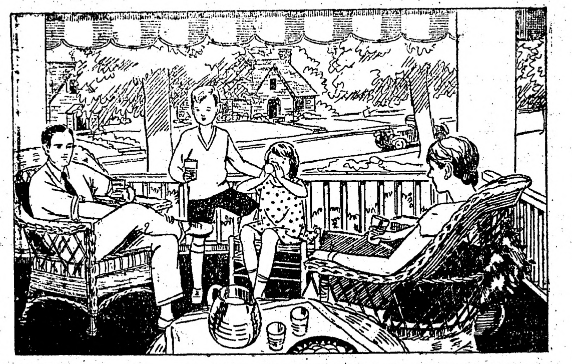
Glorified Foods

It is only common sense for the canner to have foods grown under the best possible conditions, picked and packed in the most perfect manner, because the success of his industry depends on food coming to the consumer in the most satisfactory condition.

And it is rather pleasant, isn't it, to look back as we eat canned pineapple, on those days in Hawaii where Nature paints skies very blue and reefs very coral, and pineapples very golden, when we thought that never again would we eat such delicious tropical fruits.

It is well, indeed, to eat with our mind's eye, if we know the foods we eat are those foods which memory has forever glorified.*

FOR ROYAL THIRSTS



SUMMERTIME is the season when our thirsts assume royal proportions, and a succession of drinks goes far to make a successful day. Luckily, quenching this thirst is good for us. The liquid which we imbibe helps cool us off, and, if it has fruit juices in it, they add vitamins and minerals to our system, and the sugar which it contains will give energy.

For Children and Adults

For the children—and for grown-ups, too—it is often desirable to combine milk with fruit juices. For this purpose, evaporated milk is especially desirable as it will not curdle in the combination.

Carbonated water or ginger ale, if of high grade and carefully made, may be drunk by children and adults alike, and adds a pleasant fillip to the beverages. During the summer all syrup from canned fruit as well as juice from the fresh should be saved to aid in the making of cooling drinks. And when canned fruit is bought for the sake of the syrup, the solid fruit itself can be used in ice-cream, gelatin desserts and puddings.

Here are some recipes for delicious drinks which have all been tested by a dietitian. The first six are particularly well adapted for children.

Chocolate Cinnamon Malted Milk: Shake together in a shaker or large glass jar six tablespoons malted milk, four tablespoons canned chocolate syrup, one teaspoon cinnamon, one-half cup water, two and one-half cups milk and some cracked ice. This makes four tall glasses.

Pineapple Milk Shake: Shake together in a jar or shaker one-half cup canned chocolate syrup, one cup evaporated milk (or fresh cream), one cup pineapple syrup, one cup water and cracked ice. This fills four tall glasses.

Pineapple Milk Shake: Shake together in a jar or shaker one-half cup canned chocolate syrup, one cup evaporated milk (or fresh cream), one cup pineapple syrup, one cup water and cracked ice. This fills four large glasses.

Maple Ginger Cream: Shake together one-third cup maple syrup, one and one-fourth cups evaporated milk, one pint of ginger ale, and cracked ice. Pour into four tall glasses and sprinkle a little nutmeg over the top if you like it.

Colorful Cordials

Prunade: Boil one-third cup sugar and two cups water together for five minutes; cool. Add juice of eight limes, one cup pineapple syrup, one cup prune juice and three cups cold water. Serve very cold in punch glasses. These amounts will make 12 to 15 punch glasses.

Currant and Raspberry Shrub: Boil one-third cup currant jelly, two cups water and one-third cup sugar until the jelly is melted. Cool and add juice of two lemons and contents of a number two can of raspberries, pressed through a sieve. Chill, add two cups carbonated water, and serve at once. This makes twelve punch glasses.

Apricot Punch: Press contents of a number 2 can of apricots through a sieve. Boil two-thirds cup sugar and two cups water five minutes, cool and add to apricot purée. Add juice of six limes and four cups plain or charged water and serve very cold in punch glasses. This will make about sixteen punch glasses.

Effervescent Beverages

Four Fruit Fizz: Have the following ingredients ice cold, mix together and serve over cracked ice: syrup from a number 3 can of fresh prunes, one cup pineapple syrup, one cup orange juice, one-fourth cup lemon juice, two bottles charged water. This makes about sixteen punch glasses.

Cherry Rickey: Boil one-fourth cup sugar with one cup water, cool and add one-fourth cup Maraschino cherry juice and the syrup from a number 2 can of sour pitted cherries, a ten-ounce can of grapefruit juice, and one cup of water. Chill. Add one bottle of White Rock and serve ice cold.

Havana Special: Mix contents of a ten-ounce can of grapefruit juice and one cup pineapple syrup, and add one-fourth cup sugar which has been boiled with one cup water and cooled. Chill, add one bottle carbonated water, and serve ice cold in punch glasses. A sprig of mint may be served in each glass if desired. This recipe makes about ten punch glasses.*

Commencement Exercises To Be Held Here June 1

The Commencement exercises for the local school will be held on Thursday evening, June 1, at 8:15 p. m. in the school auditorium. Rev. Morris Peterson, of Greenbush, will deliver the address of the evening.

There are eight graduates from the eighth grade, as follows:

Alice Bottem
Clara Engebretson
Hjalmer Gilbertson
Orlene Hagglund
Elvin Jarshaw
Gertrude Nohre
Eleanor Peterson
Margaret Sagstuen

There are sixteen members of the Junior class who are completing their three years of high school work. They are:

Stilaf Anderson
Beaulah Bennes
Reuben Carlson
Gladys Dahl
Margaret Davis
Pearl Doran
Esther Evenson
Myran Gunheim
Ruby Hall
Eunice Johnson
Murnet Johnson
Gustav Michaelson
Clarice Rodahl
Clara Sandberg
Gladys Sanoden
Gertrude Voth

Eleanor Peterson, who is the highest ranking pupil in the eighth grade, will deliver a valedictory for the class; and Margaret Davis, who leads the Junior class in scholarship, will represent her class by a similar speech. Several musical numbers have been arranged for the program. The public is cordially invited to attend these exercises.

Statement by H. P. Wahlin

A good many of our communities here in Minnesota have now had cooperative creameries for many years, in fact they have had their creameries so long that in a good many instances they are no longer appreciated in spite of the fact that for more than a quarter of a century the cooperative creameries have proven to be the best market for butterfat.

Why are prices for butterfat higher where there are cooperative creameries than where there are none? Because the cooperative creamery fixes the market value on butterfat, and fair prices can always be paid as all profits are returned to the farmers who supply the raw material.

A first class cooperative creamery can manufacture butter at a cost of 2½ to 3½ cents per pound. The cost of manufacture thru the cream station system is about double as compared to the cooperative creameries. Then you may ask, how can the cream station in some instances pay as much as the creamery? The answer is simple—They pay one price in one community and lower or higher prices in other commuities depending upon the competition. Why is butterfat selling from five to fifteen cents less per pound in other states where there are no cooperative creameries? Ask the farmer in Kansas, Nebraska, and other states where the the farmer has no creamery to protect himself with.

Cream stations tend to lower the quality of the manufactured product, thereby decreasing consumption and lowering price to the producer, also increasing the cost of manufacture and tear down local communities and help build up private interests to be used later in fighting the producers from getting a fair price for his products. Mr. Farmer should bear in mind that cream stations are not operated for the benefit of the producers, but to build up institutions that are controlled by the few, and to help matters along they usually try and operate under the cloak of some local business man, who has forgotten all respect for building up his own community, in his attempt to get a few extra dollars out of the pockets of the farmers.

Hans P. Wahlin.

Feed Variety Important
Variety in the dairy ration is very important. If an animal in good health loses its appetite, the ration usually lacks variety. When several concentrates are included in the ration, there is less danger of a lack of any certain kind of protein or mineral matter than when a smaller number is used. Two kinds of roughage, one a succulent feed and the other a good legume hay, are desirable.

Minnesota's Work Program

A ten million dollar water power and flood control outlay, financed by federal funds under the national public works program, is planned by the state of Minnesota according to a news dispatch from St. Paul.

Governor Olson, who drafted the four projects with E. V. Willard, acting state conservation commissioner, will go to Washington soon to seek federal approval.

The program includes:

Developement of water power on streams near the North Shore of Lake Superior. Estimated cost $5,000,000.

Construction of dams in the Minnesota river for flood control and water pawer, and to aid in maintaining a navigable Mississippi river chanel. Estimated cost $2,750,000.

Resumption of flood control work in the Roseau river valley, begun by the state at a cost of $213,000 and abandoned for lack of funds. Estimated cost $1,250,000.

Control of outflow of upper and lower Red Lakes, and developing the Red Lake River for power production and flood control. Estimated cost $1,000,000.

Thief Lake Is Described As a Worthy Project

Wm. F. Munch, state game warden and supervisor of the Thief Lake project, was a visitor here on Monday. He stated that he had been informed that we had published an item in our paper stating that Thief Lake was dry and that the project was a total failure. We have not done this so there is no mark against us in the book of sins for that but, we did say some time ago that the water in the Lake was low and that Mud Lake was dry.

Mud Lake is bone dry that we know but, as for Thief Lake we can say no more than that the project is coming right along according to Mr. Munch.

We take the liberty of publishing the following story from the Warren Sheaf which gives you a general idea of what they have up in the old lake bed.

With approximately 4,500 acres under water and the territory teeming with wild game, Thief Lake, Marshall county's re-made lake is gradually taking its former self, in the opinion of John P. Bordewich, Marshall county sheriff, who in company with his son John Jr., and S. S. Easter, county emergency relief director, made a pleasure trip to the lake on Sunday, May 14.

The local men met Mr. E. R. Youngdale, state engineer, who supervised the construction of the Thief Lake dam and who also had charge of making the surveys for the Thief Lake watershed which is now being rapidly saturated with water.

The party went on a launch trip up the ditch for two or three miles and then poled their way into the lake bed proper, Mr. Bordewich stating that there was from two to three feet of water 250 feet north of the ditch. In some of the deeper places in the lake proper there is water four feet or more deep. There is also a considerable quantity of water on the south side of the ditch which runs thru the lake.

During the trip the party saw thousands of ducks including mallards, teal, canvass backs, blue bills, etc. The game and fish department this year brought in 20 large Canadian geese in the hopes that they will help attract the flight next fall. They also saw large numbers of duck nests, filled with eggs, indicating many birds will be hatched in the reserve this year.

One of the interesting sights seen was a large beaver swimming around in the ditch. It is reported that there is a large colony of beaver in the territory that is multiplying rapidly.

There is also some fish in the lake, mostly Northern Pike.

The game and fish department is also placing some more new dams in the Moose river northeast of the lake in order to further saturate the swamps and provide a steady flow of fresh water into the lake. At the present time Moose River is well filled with water.

Memorial Day

Memorial Day, tenderest of American holidays, is with us again, remindful of the debt a grateful country owes the men who gave their all for its safety and perpetuity. Amid its preoccupation with economic stress, the Republic pauses to celebrate with piety and pride the deeds of bravery and patriotism performed by its sons on land and sea in the hour of emergency. It does so in the reassuring confidence that should duty ever call again the breed will not be found to be extinct. Its glory and its traditions survive in the hearts of living Americans.

This day of remembrance of our heroic dead has more than ordinary significance.

The need of the hour is for the stamina that has overthrown every armed enemy of the United States. The situation calls today for no whit less of courage, of perseverance, of the will to conquer than our forces have always displayed when they faced the foe.

It is meet to recall the vicissitudes of the founding fathers and to derive inspiration afresh from their fortitude and faith. It was these virtues, as well as valor in battle, that made their cause triumphant.

Prize Drawing To Be Held Saturday Evening, June 3

The Commercial Club met on Wednesday evening and made arrangements for holding their next prize day drawing on Saturday evening, June 3.

A short musical program will be given at 8:30 sharp by the Holt Commuity Band and the drawing will start at 9 o'clock.

The prizes will be the same as at the last prize day. $40 in cash will be given away which will be divided into two $5 first prizes and fifteen $2 cash prizes.

The club also decided to appropriate money for the purpose of buying new screens and screen door for the village band stand. Local merchants agreed to sell the material at cost and the work of putting on the screens will be donated.

Origin of "Tennessee"

The word "Tennessee" is said to be a corruption of an Indian word which is usually written "tenasse," which means "river of the big bend," according to some authorities, and "a curved spoon," according to others. The name "Tennessee" was applied to the region while it was still a part of North Carolina.—Pathfinder Magazine.

A PLAN
Recently a customer of the bank described a certain farmer in this community with this expression: "He would get rich farming in the Desert of Sahara." Why is this man succeeding when his neighbors fail? He has a plan—uses his head, together with his hands. Everything about the farm is done on a schedule.
His cream checks and other incomes are regularly deposited in this bank. He pays by check. At the end of each month the bank renders a statement. Thus he has a complete record of his income and payments.
May we help you in the same way?

International Tariff Truce Seems Assured—Progress Toward War Debt Settlement—Senate Passes Bill for Control of Securities.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

N. H. Davis

ONE of the busiest men in the world these days is Norman H. Davis, American ambassador-at-large in Europe, and it would appear that he is doing his multifarious jobs very well. It was up to him to persuade the British government to accept the proposal of President Roosevelt that there be an international tariff truce pending the outcome of the world economic conference in London. This he accomplished, according to an announcement by Prime Minister MacDonald in the house of commons, although Great Britain made important reservations providing that the trade pacts now being negotiated by Britain should not be affected. The text of the agreement between Davis and MacDonald was cabled to Washington for the final approval of the American government, which was promptly given.

France, Italy and Belgium have accepted the tariff truce, the two former stipulating that it be based on the present dollar valuation and that a superduty can be imposed if the dollar depreciates further. Favorable responses were expected in Washington from Japan, Germany, Holland and China.

PRIME MINISTER MAC DONALD in his speech to parliament also took up the subjects of war debts and world disarmament, throwing considerable light on the negotiations between his government and President Roosevelt.

He declared that the world economic conference cannot be fully successful unless the war debt difficulties have been removed before it comes to an end. He said that on this "there is complete union of opinion." The premier asked parliament to hush up discussion of this question and not ask embarrassing questions concerning his negotiations with the United States.

He said that if the world disarmament conference was to come to anything like a satisfactory conclusion, the United States would have to take part in a consultative pact, "the effect of which would be to increase the security of European nations and the safety of threatened nations against war." The United States, he said, had so agreed and an announcement would soon be made in Washington to that effect.

President Roosevelt presumably agrees with MacDonald concerning the necessity of settling the war debts. He sent to congress a message asking that he be given authority to deal with the other nations in settling the debt issue, at least temporarily. Secretary of State Hull admitted that the debt matter would be taken up concurrently with the issues before the economic conference, but both he and MacDonald insisted it would not form part of the conference discussion. MacDonald said the June 15 due date on debts was "an awkward hurdle" and asked parliament not to make it harder to surmount by premature debate.

France hopes for a moratorium or its equivalent on the payment it owes June 15, and the cabinet confirmed its decision not to pay the nineteen million odd defaulted in December unless it is granted, rejecting Herriot's proposal that the debt interest due be paid immediately. In Washington it was said the administration felt strongly that no consideration should be given France on the June 15 payment unless she first paid up the sum that was due in December.

In his message to congress President Roosevelt also asked for a grant of blanket power to negotiate tariff revisions so he can carry out his program for stimulating world trade by breaking down high tariff barriers.

TURNING back to the matter of world disarmament, we again find Norman Davis active. He had a long talk in London with Dr. Alfred Rosenberg, who is Chancellor Hitler's chief adviser in foreign affairs, and is said to have told him flatly that the United States is utterly opposed to any increase in armaments by anyone, and that America regards Germany's present policy of demanding a larger army as an obstacle to the success of the disarmament conference. He let the German know that the United States government thinks Germany is tending to become a disturber of European peace.

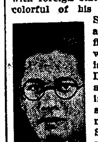
Rosenberg in return, it is said, disclaimed any intention on Germany's part to disturb peace, but reiterated Germany's claim to equality of armaments, preferably to be obtained by disarmament of other nations to the present German level than by Germany's rearming to their level.

THE Wheeler resolution, urging American delegates to the world economic conference to work for an agreement to remonetize silver at 16 to 1 with gold, was approved by the senate. The resolution merely calls on the delegates to "work unceasingly for an international agreement to remonetize silver on a basis of a definite fixed ratio of not to exceed sixteen fine ounces of silver to one fine ounce of gold."

THE international wheat conference opened in Geneva and the American delegation was on hand, its members including Henry Morgenthau, Sr.; George C. Haas, member of the federal farm board, and Frederick E. Murphy, publisher of the Minneapolis Tribune.

THE Simpson price-fixing amendment to the farm bill was rejected by the house by a decisive vote—283 to 109—because Chairman Jones of the agriculture committee declared the President was opposed to it and Majority Leader Byrns urged the house to stand behind the administration.

The senate agreed to the report on the measure by the conference committee after vain protest by advocates of the price fixing amendment. It also yielded to the house by agreeing to broaden the power of the secretary of agriculture to initiate and approve agreements for marketing farm products, without regard to the anti-trust laws, and to license the handlers of agricultural commodities. Under the bill as finally passed the secretary may include under these provisions not only the seven basic commodities embraced by the benefit and production control portions of the bill but all agricultural products processed and marketed in this country.



T. V. Soong

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT continued his economic conversations with foreign statesmen, and the most colorful of his visitors was T. V. Soong, the youthful appearing minister of finance of China, who was presented by Minister Alfred Sze. Doctor Soong naturally was especially interested in what stand the President might take in the Sino-Japanese quarrel, and he stated in detail the position of China. No information was given out indicating Mr. Roosevelt's intentions in the matter, but press dispatches from Washington were received in Peiping quoting Soong as saying he had been assured of American intervention in China if Japanese troops captured Peiping. These dispatches probably were misleading if not entirely false.

Viscount Kikujiro Ishii is on his way from Japan to Washington, and when he meets the President he, too, will be concerned mainly with the American attitude toward the Far East embroglio. He is prepared to defend the Japanese conquest of Manchuria and will urge American recognition of the puppet state of Manchukuo. One of his important tasks will be to learn how far the idea of a consultative pact to implement the Kellogg-Briand anti-war treaty has developed. As was said above, Mr. MacDonald told parliament that the United States had agreed to take part in such a pact.

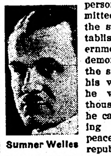
Others who consulted with Mr. Roosevelt were Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, president of the Reichsbank, who brought up the questions of German equality at arms and boundary revisions; and Albert J. Pani, finance minister of Mexico.

GOING ahead with the President's program for federal regulating of most things, the senate passed the administration bill for the control of securities sold in interstate commerce. Differences between the senate measure and that already put through the house were mostly slight and easily compromised. The former, however, contained an amendment offered by Senator Hiram Johnson of California setting up federal machinery to aid holders of foreign bonds that are in default.

Under the bill, the federal trade commission will become the governing body of the securities trade. Persons or corporations about to sell securities in interstate commerce and agents of foreign governments about to sell foreign securities must register each issue with the commission, together with detailed information concerning the issue.

Large groups of securities are exempt, such as short term commercial paper, government, state, and municipal bonds, securities of railroads and other utilities subject to federal regulation, national bank securities, and securities issued by educational and benevolent organizations.

WAR against Bolivia in the Gran Chaco dispute was formally declared by President Eusebio Ayala of Paraguay, the peace negotiations conducted by neutral South American nations having failed. The warfare has been going on unofficially since June, 1932. Neither nation shows any signs of yielding. The Paraguayans hailed their President's action with joy, and the Bolivians said they were ready to fight.



Sumner Welles

SUMNER WELLES, the capable new American ambassador to Cuba, was received at the dock in Havana by a few officials and about 100 other persons who were permitted to pass through the strong guards established by the government to prevent a demonstration. Along the sea wall drive on his way to his hotel he was cheered by thousands who hope he can help in restoring prosperity and peace in the island republic. In a statement handed to local newspaper men the ambassador referred to the historic bonds between the United States and Cuba.

"I will give my most earnest consideration to the fundamental problem of regenerating the healthy flow of trade between us," he said. "I hold the sincere conviction that it is to the prime interest of Cuba, as well as to the interest of the citizens of the United States, that there be considered at an appropriate moment the bases for an agreement which will stimulate the advantageous interchange of commodities to an equal extent between both countries."

Concerning the Cuban political situation, Mr. Welles said:

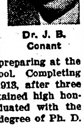
"The government of the United States reiterates the (Elihu) Root interpretation given to the Platt amendment in 1901; that is, that the Platt amendment is not synonymous with intermeddling in the domestic affairs of Cuba."

REPORTS from Washington that President Roosevelt planned to provide emergency relief to avert a food shortage in cities were ignored by the National Farmers' Holiday association at Des Moines, and an appeal was issued by it to every planter and cattleman in the country to join in the farm strike.

Milo Reno, president of the association, said that when the house of representatives killed the Simpson amendment to the farm relief bill, which would have guaranteed production costs, all hopes of cancelling the strike were shattered.

The other four points of the association's demands are: Settlement of mortgages on a low-interest, long-term basis, lower property taxes, free silver and payment of the soldier bonus.

Meeting in Montevideo, Minn., members of the Minnesota Farm Holiday association voted to join in the strike. They also demanded that the President remove Secretary of Agriculture Wallace from office because he opposed the Simpson amendment. The 4,000 delegates decided they would not pay interest, taxes or other debts until the dollar became an "honest measure of value." The association demanded federal operation of banks and other credit agencies and a national Presidential moratorium on farm, city home and personal property foreclosures, and other relief measures. R. L. Rickard, president of the Oklahoma Holiday association, predicted that 90 per cent of the farmers of Oklahoma would withhold their products from market.



Dr. J. B. Conant

HARVARD adds itself to the list of universities with young presidents, the corporation having selected James Bryant Conant, forty years old, to succeed A. Lawrence Lowell. He is Sheldon Emery professor of organic chemistry in the university and is widely known among scientists for his research work in special fields.

Born at Dorchester, Mass., March 26, 1893, the son of James Scott Conant and Jennett Bryant Conant, he entered Harvard college in 1910, after preparing at the Roxbury Latin school. Completing his college work in 1913, after three years in which he attained high honors, Conant was graduated with the degree of A. B. His degree of Ph. D. was conferred in 1916 and the next year he received an appointment as instructor at Harvard.

After serving during the war with the bureaus of chemistry and mines, he returned to Harvard in 1919 as assistant professor of chemistry. In 1925 he became an associate professor and two years later a full professor. His present position of Sheldon Emery professor dates back from the year 1929.

SENATOR GLASS produced a new banking reform bill that was expected to have the backing of the administration. It was approved by the senate banking subcommittee after that body had made an important change which would require private bankers to abandon either their business in deposits or in securities. The bill is designed to curb the use of federal reserve credit in speculation and to insure deposits in federal reserve member banks through a $2,000,000,000 corporation.

PRESSED by the budget bureau, the navy agreed to cut its expenses $53,000,000 in the next fiscal year. As a part of the economy move, officials tentatively have decided to place one-third of the fleet on the "rotating plan," or inactive status. Recruiting and training at the Norfolk, San Diego, Newport and Great Lakes training stations also will be stopped temporarily. It was understood a 1,000 reduction in officer personnel is contemplated.

Hankinson.—Robert Aldrich, formerly of Hankinson, and Paul Jones, of Aberdeen, S. D., have leased the Spring Grove summer resort, situated on Big Stone lake near Ortonville, Minn.

Fort Yates.—Grain shipments on the trans-Missouri division of the Milwaukee road in April were the highest in ten years. Ninety-six cars loaded during the last week brought the total to 390.

Bottineau.—A reforestation camp will be located here. Building of barracks will start in a short time in which two hundred men will be encamped in the Bottineau county fair grounds.

Northwood.—Three young men of Northwood started out in an open Ford with "See America First" as their slogan. Business men of that city provided the car license and some gas and provisions, the boys expecting to work when possible for the rest of their expenses.

Max.—The Max fire department has tentatively decided on constructing a new fire hall, purchase of a new truck, pump, 500 gallon tank and a quantity of hose. Committees were named to ascertain costs, and will report at a meeting in the near future.

Langdon.—Julius Klemisch of Langdon is way ahead of the rest of the gardeners in this section, he recently exhibited full-grown bean plants, bearing regular beans raised by him this season. He raised the early crop in a sheltered hot bed.

Minot.—Glenn J. Jarrett, football coach of the Minot city schools, was chosen by Sigma Chi fraternity as the most representative undergraduate in five states, for the academic year of 1929-30. He received a medal symbolic of the honor.

Beach.—Frank Genino, 62, is held under guard in a hospital at Beach after attempting to commit suicide and who is charged with the murder of Mrs. Rosalia Dodge, 86, and her daughter, Mrs. Hattie Steger, 57. Genino is expected to recover.

Edgeley.—Private Raymond J. Iberson, 21, who was engaged in military service at Montgomery, Ala., was injured fatally as his motorcycle crashed into an automobile at Maxwell field, government airport at Montgomery, Ala. His body is being brought here for burial.

Jamestown.—Maxwell Anderson, was announced as winner of the $1,000 Pulitzer award for the best American play in New York produced in 1932. The play was "Both Your Houses." Mr. Anderson is a graduate of Jamestown high school, class of 1908, and the North Dakota university in 1911.

Ray.—Frank Johnson of Ray escaped serious injury in some mysterious manner when he was filling the gas tank in a truck. The five gallon can which he was using exploded, blowing the top off the truck and burning his face and hands, his clothes were not ignited.

Bottineau.—The Minnewaukan Presbyterial at the 28th annual session held here elected Mrs. J. A. Shannon, Devils Lake, as their next president.

Denhoff.—Troop of Denhoff, under the direction of Scoutmaster A. W. Larson, was awarded first place in the Brush Lake district scout jamboree.

Carrington.—Carrington has been chosen as one of the three concentration points in North Dakota for the 1933 wool pool. There will be a federal grader at the Carrington warehouse to grade the 1933 clip as soon as shearing is in full swing.

Bowdon.—Mrs. John F. Wake, a former resident of Bowdon, will visit the grave of her brother who lost his life in the battle of the Argonne and is buried in the Meuse-Argonne American military cemetery in France. She sailed on May 17th on the President Harding liner.

How I Broke Into The Movies

Copyright by Hal C. Herman

By GLORIA SWANSON

I WAS never "screen-struck." I did not think of the movies as a road to fame and fortune. And I spent no weary weeks at the studio gates waiting for "my chance."

An impulse, or perhaps it may better be called a "hunch," was responsible for my introduction into motion pictures.

My old interest in acting had been confined to school plays. The first appearance I ever made was as a child of seven, when I had a singing role in a benefit performance at Key West, Fla., where my father, an army officer, was stationed. I do not remember whether the benefit was a brilliant success. Certainly, my part in it could not have been exceptional.

On another occasion, in Porto Rico, I was the "leading lady" of an operetta given by my school. I had been told since that my "natural talent" was the subject of numerous comments, but I paid little attention to the remarks of my elders. I only knew that I enjoyed doing such things.

Later, I returned to Chicago to finish my schooling in the city of my birth. One day my aunt suggested a visit to the old Essanay studios. Up to this time I had taken no particular interest in motion pictures, but I welcomed the opportunity to visit the studio in order to satisfy my natural curiosity. I was then fifteen years old.

Gloria Swanson.

Once past the gate of the studio I was fascinated. It was all so new to me, so different. And then came the "hunch." Almost without realizing what I was saying, I expressed a desire to appear before the cameras. A director or some one who stood nearby heard me; my first appearance was not as an extra, but as a "bit" player. After that I was given further "bits."

As time went on, I became more fascinated and made the most of every opportunity to learn all there was to learn. In three months I was made a stock player, which meant that I was guaranteed four days' pay each week, at $3.25 a day, whether I worked or not. Consequently, I was given more interesting parts to play. I was cast for a "bit" in Charlie Chaplin's first Essanay picture, "His New Job," but after about a dozen rehearsals of a single scene Charlie "fired" me. He was quite right. I was terrible. Later, I appeared in George Ade's "Elvira Farina and Meal Ticket."

My "breaking into" the movies had been quite simple, but I quickly discovered that the business of remaining in the ranks, while hundreds clamored for admittance, called for plenty of hard work. And I have worked very hard ever since that time.

On leaving Essanay, I decided to journey to California. After two weeks in Los Angeles I went to Mack Sennett at the Keystone studio and was signed for a picture following a brief rehearsal. Then I made one picture at Universal; Mack Sennett offered me a contract and I "held out" for $75 a week, with an increase of $5 or $10 every three months or so. He agreed to pay the amount and the contract was signed. I appeared in a number of Sennett comedies, being co-starred with Bobby Vernon, but during my work there, for a year and a half, I never was cast in a "bathing beauty" picture. The general belief that I once was a Sennett bathing girl is erroneous. I left the Sennett lot for a starring contract with the Triangle company, which enabled me to make progress in more serious roles. Next I appeared under Cecil B. DeMille's direction and then came the lengthy starring contract with Famous Players.

In 1926 I became an owner-member of United Artists, and a independent producer. "Sadie Thompson" in the silent screen version of "Rain," was one of the most popular of the plays made under this arrangement. More recently I have appeared in several pictures made in England.

Marion's Freckles

One of the few people in the world who looks beautiful with freckles is Marion Davies. "Zander" featured her freckles and it is remembered as an outstanding characterization. "Peg o' My Heart" will be minus curls. Marion will have the same tight pigtails and freckles that were so popular in "Zander."

Funny thing that Marion's freckles do not show in real life but the camera seems to bring them out when she doesn't use makeup.

WEEDS CULTIVATED

Scientists have found that weeds, or rather the pollen from them, are one of the prime causes of hay fever among people susceptible to it, and since not all weeds grow naturally in California and pollen from only extra fine weeds can be used in labortary work, the growers have to cultivate them in well-tended garden plots for several months each year. One pollen garden is situated in Big Bear valley, where plants requiring a high elevation to thrive are grown; another is in Van Nuys.—Los Angeles Times.

"Yes, she is real peculiar. Her mother was the same. She'd go a long time without hardly openin' her head, Laura Mannin' would, and then she'd up and take the bit in her teeth—like when she named Algy, and sent Mary off to school! I've always thought Mary some like her mother. But the menfolks do seem to like her—they never show much sense in their selections. Why, I never had an offer till I was most thirty!—Blanche don't seem to pindle none, does she?"

"No, she's actually gained since she's been nursing the baby, and she said the other day she'd never be happier in her life. I can't see what ails the girls in this generation. Rosalie King has come to visit Mrs. Weston again, and I can't see that she's changed at all. She doesn't even wear crepe—just plain black—and she says 'she should worry,' that she's 'hung on to her old job and got a raise at that' and that although she can't always buy the 'very latest' to wear, she's got a 'long way from September morn'—whatever she means by that! One of her usual vulgar expressions! And yet Mrs. Weston says she knows Rosalie thought the world of that man she married. She can't have, that's all—not in the way a woman of real refinement would have cared. Why, after Martin died, I refused all nourishment—except what was absolutely necessary, of course, to keep up my strength—and lay in a dark room for weeks and never dreamed of stirring out, even after that, except to go to church and to the cemetery. My heart was buried in the grave. I'm afraid Mary has been putting some of her queer ideas into Blanche's head, for when I asked her a little while ago if hers wasn't, she said no indeed, it was all with Philip!"

"Land! Where does she think Philip is?"

"She said in Heaven. And that Heaven was anywhere, if you could only see it."

Mrs. Elliott arose, and folded her work. "Them kind of notions give me the creeps," she said uneasily. "I must be goin'."

Mary was sitting on top of Countess hill, her chin resting on her hands, looking out over the meadows. She sat very still, watching the changing light. Without understanding why, and in spite of all her grief and weariness, she felt that one of the great hours of her life had come. The beauty and peace and promise of the country suddenly seemed to overcome her as no inanimate things had ever overcome her before. She felt, like an actual presence, the spirit of her puritan forefathers who had turned this valley from a wilderness into a garden, who had lived their simple faith as truly as they had professed it, who had fought and died, when necessary, for an ideal. She turned her head, half expecting to glimpse some heavenly vision, trembling— But there was nothing to be heard, nothing to be seen, only something wonderful to be felt. She bowed her head and prayed.

It was a long time before she lifted it again. When she did, Paul, bareheaded, dressed in khaki, was standing beside her.

She sprang to her feet, shaking all over, entirely unable to speak. He was taller, thinner, paler, infinitely older and graver, all the bloom and softness of his boyish beauty had gone. For a moment she thought—it must be— She shut her eyes, swaying and crying aloud, as she felt herself falling. Then suddenly she was upheld by a strong arm, swung quickly around her shoulder, a firm hand taking both her trembling ones in a warm and steady grasp.

"There, there," Paul was saying, as if he had been speaking to a little child, and patting her arm as he spoke. "It's all right. I didn't mean to frighten you like this. Don't, Mary. Don't cry so. Why, there is nothing to cry about! I'm all right. I'm here!

"Can't we sit down and talk?" he asked, and drew her down beside him on the big rock, still holding her hand. Then seeing how utterly impossible it was for her to speak, he went on, "I got in on the four o'clock and walked straight up to the farm. I didn't let mother know I was coming, for I thought, if I did, she'd have the minister, or a delegation from the D. A. R. or the Wallacetown band, or maybe all three, at the station to meet me. It never occurred to me that none of my letters from the other side telling her in a general way when to expect me, would have reached her."

"Tell me," said Mary, finding her voice at last.

"There isn't much to tell. You know what happened up to the time I was wounded. And the wound—the first one—didn't amount to anything. I was back at the front in no time. And then I was—hurt—again, before I was taken prisoner—"

"Go on."

"I was a prisoner several months, you see. I couldn't write then. Even after the armistice was signed, we weren't released right off. And then for a while, I wasn't well—"

"You mean you were starving."

"Well, I wasn't hungry, anyway!" said Paul, lightly. "But I'm all right now. And I'm home. You won't mind, will you, if I don't tell you more than this, just now? We—the men who've been there—don't like to talk about it much. Won't you say you're glad to see me? All the rest of the family has. Mother had hysterics, of course, but she was awfully glad, just the same. I couldn't help knowing that. And Blanche—well of course Blanche and I both broke down a little. I didn't know, you see, about Philip—or little Philip. Well, then I went to the barn and found Cousin Seth. He said I might find you up here."

Now they were sitting on the old boulder, hand in hand, as they had done when they used to rest after picking blackberries—

"You're not strong," she said with a great effort, "and you've had this—this hard climb to reach me. I'm sorry."

For a moment Paul did not answer. Then he took the hand he held, and laid it against his lips.

"No, I'm not strong," he said huskily. "I know that. And I have had to climb—to climb a long way—to reach you. But I'm not sorry. I'm glad."

"Paul! You know I didn't mean it that way!"

"I know you didn't, dear, but I did. For it's true. But please tell me—aren't you glad I'm here, at last?"

"Yes," said Mary, very low indeed.

"Then, may I tell you—anything I want to?"

"Yes," she said again, lower still.

"Do you remember what you said to me—that day in Boston—about what loving really means?"

"Yes," said Mary a third time, though it was only a whisper now.

"Well—that's the way I love you. You were right—I didn't then. But I have learned to, since. At first it was just a dreadful physical longing and raging grief because I hadn't got what I wanted. I'd felt so hopeful—so sure—that day I went to you in Boston, that I'd get my week—but all the time the things you'd said about how you loved me, kept hammering themselves into my stupid brain, making me see more and more clearly that, even then, I didn't care for you like that, or it wouldn't be my own disappointment I'd be thinking most about. It would be the way I'd treated you, from the time we were youngsters—taking all your loveliness and goodness for granted—and then throwing it away—"

"Don't, Paul," she said softly. "Don't speak of that, or even remember it any more. I've forgotten all about it."

"I haven't," he said between his teeth, "I never shall, I never can, unless—I can atone for it. I began to forget that I had lost you—and to wonder how—"

"How you could get me back?"

"Not even that—till afterwards. Only how I could make things up to you. Whether there was anything on earth I could do to make me worthy to come to you and say I was sorry, whether you were proud of me or not. That I'd got to change inside. I'd reached that point by the time I got to prison, and then it was weeks and weeks before I could think at all. But when I could—it was what kept me clean—"

"And there wasn't any 'pretty little French peasant,'" he said, after a long pause. And in that one simple sentence, Mary understood, though she could not answer, all that he was trying to tell her.

He misinterpreted her silence. He kissed her hand again, dropped it gently, and rose.

"It was wrong of me, maybe, to say all this to you—so soon," he said. "But I saw Mr. Hamlin just before I sailed for home. He told me—that—that you hadn't changed your mind about him, and that he knew you never would. He told me, too, that he knew you'd refused Thomas Gray. Sylvia sent me a message once, by David—I didn't get it until after she died—telling me never to stop fighting for you, if I had to die fighting. I thought for a while, that I was going to die fighting—then in that German prison, I was afraid for a while that I wasn't even going to die fighting—that it was to be starving, rotting. Now I know I'm not going to die at all—not for a good many years, I mean—but I'm going to live fighting. Do you remember, when I was a little chap, how I used to stand in the front yard, whenever I wanted to see you, and simply holler, 'Come over Mary, come over?' And you always came! I'm going right on calling for you now, until I've made you come again! I'll go down now, and see mother—I promised her that I wouldn't be long. But we'll see each other, some way, right along, won't we, Mary?"

He was half-way down the hill when he felt her touch on his arm. He turned quickly.

"What is it, dear?" he asked. "Is anything the matter?"

"No—yes—I haven't been honest."

"You haven't been honest!" echoed Paul in astonishment. "What do you mean?"

"I let you go away thinking that. I was afraid to let you think anything else, because I knew, though you 'wanted' me so much, you didn't really love me—then. I—I hoped you would, some day. It's nearly killed me ever since to think if you never came back you wouldn't know—to remember that I didn't even kiss you good-by. For I wasn't honest. I mean—it was possible—I mean, I did—"

Paul stood for a stupefied moment, staring at her. Then he cried aloud with joy.

"You care now!" he exclaimed. "You have cared all the time!" Then, as he tried, very gently, to take down the trembling hands with which she had suddenly covered her face, he realized that his own were shaking, too.

"Mary," he said brokenly, "I won't, if you really don't want me to. But if you do—you won't make me wait any longer, will you? I've starved for you, too—"

"You won't ever have to starve again," said Mary with a great sob, and took down her hands herself.

* * * * * * *

It was very late that evening, when Jane Manning, remembering that she had not "set back her chairs" against a possible storm—though there was not a cloud in the sky—went out on her piazza to "make sure everything was all right" for the night. She stopped in the middle of her pleasant task and stood stock-still. The moon shone very clear and bright and on the wide granite doorstep of her cousin's house opposite, she could see two persons—a man and a girl—standing very close together, their arms around each other. Then the man bent his head, and it was a long, long time before he lifted it again.

"Good night, sweetheart," she heard him say at last, and then saw him turn and come down the walk, his young face lighted with a radiance that did not seem to come wholly from the moon.

"Great Glory!" ejaculated Cousin Jane aloud, and without conscious profanity.

Paul heard her, stopped for a minute, and then walked rapidly toward her.

"Is that you, Cousin Jane," he called, "fixing up the piazza? Here, let me help you!" When complete order was restored, he blocked her entrance into the house for a minute, standing with his back against the door.

"Mary is going to marry me," he said, his voice ringing like a hallelujah, "right off. We've going away for a few weeks—till I get stronger, and she gets rested—to some quiet place by the sea— And then we're coming back here to Lady Blanche farm—coming home together. Oh, God, how happy I am!"

"I dunno's I blame ye," said Cousin Jane.

His mother's house was dark, and Paul did not feel sorry. In the morning, of course, she must be told, and Mary's father—but tonight!—However, when he noticed a faint light shining from the upper windows of Carte Blanche, he went close to the little building and called—

"Blanche! May I came up?"

"Yes—I've been hoping you would."

She was sitting in a low rocker, nursing her baby. He crossed the room softly, and sat down on a footstool beside her.

"Mary's going to marry you," she whispered.

"How did you know?"

"How could I help knowing, looking at you? I've seen that look in a man's face before."

"Oh, you poor little thing!"

"Hush! Don't speak that way! I don't feel like that about it! And I'm so thankful—so happy—that I've seen it in yours, too."

They sat for a long time together, after the sleeping baby had been laid back in his cradle. And meanwhile, the woman who had never had a lover went slowly up to her room, and sitting down in the old chair, took up the Bible that lay near it, to read in it, as always, before she went to bed. It fell open at the last chapter of Proverbs:

"Who can find a virtuous woman," read Cousin Jane, "for her price is far above rubies. . . . Her children arise up also and call her blessed. Her husband also, and he praiseth her. Give her the fruit of her hands and let her own works praise her in the gates."

The Bible slipped from her lap, unnoticed, and Cousin Jane sat for a long time with happy tears rolling down her cheeks.

"I suppose that woman in the Bible may have had her faults," she said aloud at last, "same as Mary has. I shouldn't be a mite surprised if she had a tongue and a temper and a backbone and didn't forgive and forget very easy, though Solomon doesn't mention it. Seems to me there's some likeness between the two. Mary's ben faithful to the trust her dead mother left her and denied herself to do for her father and her little brothers. She's ben strong and wise enough to say 'no' to a rich man she didn't love and turn the poor, weak, shiftless boy she did love into a fine creature that needn't be afraid to look his Maker in the face. And she hasn't shirked or nagged or complained or boasted while she's ben doin' it. She's kept herself sweet and lovely through it all. There may be better jobs for women to do than things like them, but if there is, I never heard of 'em, any more than Solomon seems to hev. We've ben worryin' considerable lately about the little countess' curse, and I don't deny that it seems the Almighty gives strange powers to human bein's sometimes, even after they're dead. But for all that, I guess His blessin' is more powerful than anything else, jus' the same. And I guess, too, that as long as Mary stays here, that blessin' will rest on Lady Blanche farm in the future, same as it has in the past."

Experimental Legislation

Washington.—As the special session of congress washes up preparatory to quitting, it seems to me that interest centers chiefly on two pieces of legislation coming from the great mill of laws. Singularly enough, each must be denominated as experimental. I refer to the farm bill, with its inflation powers, and the measure designed to transform the Tennessee river valley into a gigantic laboratory for development of partially-tried plans and experimentation with theories, with the Muscle Shoals nitrate and power plants as the center.

The special session has worked at top speed. Seldom has so much been accomplished, if the measure be by volume, as has resulted from the labors of congress under the lash and complete domination of President Roosevelt. But we are concerned now with an aftermath, with a continuing force. Hence, the two enactments mentioned stand out, for the effect of the farm bill will be direct and that of the Tennessee river experiment may mark an economic milestone in the nation's history.

President Roosevelt declined to assure success for the farm bill. He termed it a gigantic experiment, an effort offered in search of relief for downtrodden agriculture, a hope for better conditions. The so-called Muscle Shoals legislation is experimental by its own language.

The provision of the farm bill delegating to the President authority to use inflationary measures with the currency is, of course, vital to every one. It has been analyzed in this column heretofore and while every one is interested in what the President may do with those powers, it does not partake of the same conditions or circumstances as the farm or Muscle Shoals legislation.

While each of these measures is designed to aid agriculture, there is a point of striking dissimilarity between them. The farm relief measure is designed to have an immediate effect. No such thought is entertained respecting the Muscle Shoals development proposal. Its purpose is predicated on a belief by those who fostered it that it will be of lasting benefit to the human race. If the theories prove workable and partially-tried plans can be carried on to successful conclusion, the hope doubtless can be realized.

A New and Untrod Path

President Roosevelt told congress when he asked enactment of the farm relief bill that he deemed it emergently necessary to take constructive steps in aid of agriculture.

"Deep study and the joint counsel of many points of view," the President said, "have produced a measure which offers great promise of good results. I tell you frankly that it is a new and untrod path, but I tell you with equal frankness that an unprecedented condition calls for the trial of new means to rescue agriculture."

The President added that if it failed to develop those results "I will be the first to acknowledge it and advise you." It appears then as a hope. We are starting on a new road.

The first principle of the bill is most peculiar. It would have cotton farmers purchase government-owned cotton at the present market price to whatever extent they will do so and reduce their acreage this year in accordance with the amount so bought by them and which will be held by the secretary of agriculture in trust for the purchasers until 1935, if they desire. The purchases therefore can be made on credit.

The purpose of this, of course, is to reduce production and thereby reduce the surplus in one and the same contract. The farmers cannot buy the government cotton without there being a resulting decrease in acreage. Simply stated, then, this principle is designed to shorten the supply and cause an increase in price. Of course, the farmer takes the chance that there will be no increase in price, but here again, it is "a new and untrod path" and that chance may win.

The second section of the measure has been attacked by its critics as "robbing Peter to pay Paul." It gives the secretary of agriculture authority to lease agricultural lands, paying the owner agreed sums as rental, to accomplish a reduction in acreage by removing those lands from crop productive use. That, as is readily discernible, will be an expensive proposition. The government could not do it without having funds come from somewhere to make such payments. So the sponsors of the bill laid a tax on the processors of agricultural commodities to obtain needed revenue.

It hardly need be said that the processors—the packer of meats, the miller of flour, the spinners of cotton, etc.—are going to fight this section.

Consumers Will Pay

Then, this complex piece of legislation also provides for use of the allotment plan, and other taxes on the processors and use of the tariff against imports to drive the prices of farm commodities higher. This section like the others has been questioned as to its constitutionality, and it has perhaps the strongest array of opponents, for the consumers will help pay the bill in a big way. That is, all except those who are unemployed and without funds. They cannot buy now, and charity or public relief sources will pay the added costs.

The amount of the tax to be levied on the processor, and paid the farmers who agree to reduce acreage—and that agreement must be made—is a thing which must be worked out by the secretary of agriculture. Never before, as far as my research has disclosed, has an official of government in this country had such wide powers. But the President justifies them on the ground of the necessity for preservation of agriculture.

The processors' tax is to be added to the price the farmer receives for that portion of his crop consumed in the United States. Normally our exports as a whole are only about 10 per cent of the total. The bill, however, is not applicable to all commodities. It takes in cotton, wheat, rice, tobacco, sugar beets, sugar cane, milk and its products and hogs, but the secretary of agriculture has power to make it inoperative as to any one or all of them if market conditions are such as make the use of the law inadvisable.

The processors' tax is being levied under the guise of what is called "parity of prices." It is the purpose to lift the returns which the farmer receives to a basis where compensation for his labor shall be proportionately the same, in relation to the prices he pays for things he buys, as the ratio between the sale and purchase stood in 1914. That is involved. It is complex in the extreme.

But there is no need of services of a soothsayer in pointing to the tremendous organization that is going to be necessary in carrying out such legislation. A thousand and one things must be considered, inspected, guarded, negotiated, enforced. Government employees must do that work. The machine can be made to click and run smoothly, say supporters of the plan. It is the most gigantic political machine in history, say opponents of the program. Whichever view is correct, it remains as a fact that there will be government agents in every county to tell farmers who enter into the agreements on acreage reduction what they shall do and what they shall not do; there will be inspectors galore in processing plants and accountants checking books when necessary, and there will be taxes collected in whatever amount the secretary of agriculture decrees to be needed to pay the cost.

It is in the appointment of the personnel for carrying out the act that opponents of the plan insist there is the greatest danger. They hold that it will be impossible to obtain men and women who will construe the law in the same way or who will use their discretionary power to the same extent.

* * *

Now to give consideration to the Muscle Shoals legislation:

Muscle Shoals Experiment

Senator Norris, of Nebraska, has been promoting a program of development of the Tennessee river since the national defense act of 1916 provided for an experimental production of nitrates with water power at Muscle Shoals. The late President Wilson obtained legislation in 1917 for construction of two dams there, and for power plants and laboratories for the fixation of nitrogen from the air. That was for military purposes, but as soon as that need passed, the atmospheric nitrogen was to be used for fertilizer. Senator Norris has argued for years for utilization of the country's water resources in development of electric power, and the use of that power in providing cheaper fertilizer for farms. He is known as an especially bitter foe of power companies, and times unnumbered he has charged on the floor of the senate that the power companies are a trust. He has accused them of constantly bleeding the public who have to buy those products.

But the present Muscle Shoals program, as enacted into law, goes far beyond the original Norris dream. It is, indeed, the dream of a future Tennessee valley as a man-made paradise, a laboratory for the good of the human race, a public benefaction on the part of the government.

In addition to completion of the nitrate plants and the great power program, the new law prescribes continued tests of various kinds, improvement of navigability of the river itself, reforestation of the cutover hillsides and "proper use of marginal lands." In that later authority, it is conceded, lies permission to accomplish a great many things. Marginal lands is, of course, an economic term. It means lands, the use of which for certain crops is questionable. Determination of the proper use of such lands, therefore, is undoubtedly a matter of great moment. The Tennessee Valley Authority, the official name of the government-owned corporation that will direct the great experiment, can and probably will find ways and means of using marginal lands.

WORLD'S RADIUM SUPPLY

Although at one time it was thought there was not more than half an ounce of radium in the world, at least 15½ ounces have been extracted since 1922, according to figures compiled in Paris. The total obtained since its discovery by Madame Curie is approximately 2¼ pounds. At its present price it is worth about $85,000,000,000. In 1,800 years it will have disintegrated to about half its present weight.

Svenke Svenkeson was the first Mud Lake settler to own a car. He purchased a Maxwell "runabout" from Guy Anderson.

Among the new settlers who became naturalized at Warren were C. L. Anderson, Per Kneppe, and Ole Garthus:

The Ostlund Bros. had just completed drilling wells on the Olaus Rodahl and Nels Gudvangen places.

Croquet was the big game those days, to judge from the local and neighborhood news.

Mrs. B. L. Backe shot a bobtailed wildcat in the woods south of town.

Milk — Condensed or Evaporated

Do you know the difference in these two good forms of milk? You use them so generally, and you buy them in such quantities to supplement or substitute for bottled milk, it will be interesting to know just how they differ in the process of making. The U. S. Department of Agriculture gives this interesting explanation in a booklet "Milk and Its Uses in the Home":

"Commercial sweetened condensed milk is usually made by adding cane sugar to fresh milk, heating the milk to dissolve the sugar, and then evaporating the whole until its bulk is a little less than one-half of fresh milk.

"Evaporated milk, as known in the trade, is whole milk that has been condensed in a vacuum pan to about one-half of its original volume without the addition of sugar. After it is drawn from the vacuum pan, it is put through a homogenizer to break up the fat globules, so that they will not separate on standing. The milk is then placed in sealed cans and exposed to steam under pressure. The temperature must be sufficiently high and the exposure long enough to destroy all bacteria in the milk. In this process a soft curd is usually formed, and, after the milk has cooled, the cans are shaken vigorously to break up this curd and give the milk a creamy consistency."

Due to the added sugar in sweetened condensed milk, it is not necessary to sterilize the product after it is filled into cans.*

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

The tale of a bumble bee! A bee flying into an automobile caused the death of a woman recently in California when she swerved her car off the highway and it struck a tree. Two of her sons riding in the car were severely injured.

This situation requires presence of mind and quick action. Five thousand bee stings would not be one-tenth as bad as permanent injury or death.

If you are confronted with this situation at any time, push both feet to the floor by having one foot on the clutch pedal and the other on the brake. This will stop your car immediately and the switch should be turned off. This brings your car to an instant stop and action can then be taken to clear the car of bees.

Husby Flays N. D. Governor

Charging that it "evidently was the Governor's intention to close down the dairy department, John Husby, Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor of North Dakota, recently issued a formal statement containing the action of Governor William Langer in vetoing the appropriation for the state dairy department. Only the dairy commissioner's salary escaped the axe.

"Every local and co-operative creamery in this state is jeopardized by this action. Many may be forced to the wall as a result of this veto. When and if this happens, the price of cream in localities where such creameries go out of business will be lower than ever, for the local creamery has been an important factor in holding up the price of butterfat," said one part of Husby's statement which referred to centralizer competition.

WILL END REGULATION

Unless the department can find some othe means of functioning, the statement declares, "there will be no regulation of the milk or cream business in this state for the next biennium and the farmers of this state will continue to be cheated of thousands of dollars rightfully due them."

Citing examples of the need of this inspection work, Commissioner Husby declared that investigations conducted by his department at the request of B. F. Thrailkill, chief of the dairy division of Montana, showed that two North Dakota creameries had stolen 188,000 pounds of butterfat, in the case of the first one, and 72,000 pounds, in the case of the second, from cream delivered from Montana shippers. The thefts, he declared, came in the form of under-reading fat tests. He also declared that the record of "one big North Dakota creamery showed an overrun of 49% while another had an overrun of 47%."

SHUTS OFF ACTIVITIES

"As a result of the Governor's veto, the dairy department will be unable to continue the licensing of cream stations, creameries and ice-cream manufacturing institutions after July 1," Husby's statement adds. "It will not be able to have a telephone, send a telegram or even buy a postage stamp. It will not be able to print the blanks for issuing licenses. The entire system which has been built up for the protection of the milk producer has been levelled at one sweep of the Governor's pen."

Let's co-operate in Minnesota so that we won't be in the same predicament as they are in North Dakota. — (Inserted and to be paid by Farmers Coop. Cry. Co.)

State to Oil 866 Miles of Highways

Oiling of 866 miles of bituminous surfaced state highways will begin shortly after June 15, according to an announcement by N. W. Elsberg, Minnesota Highway Commissioner.

"Only work which is essential to maintenance of present road surfaces is included in this program," Mr. Elsberg said. "The cost will be about $500,000. Ordinarily about $1,000,000 would be spent on re-treatments at this season, but we are holdindg down expenditures to a minimum.

"Later, if it developes that additional oiling must be done to prevent deterioration of any bituminous road, the necessary work will be authorized, for we intend to protect the state's investment in its trunk system first of all.

"Should Federal aid be made available to the Highway department, as we hope, then there will be an expansion of activities in proportion to the amount of money to be spent. We hope that federal aid will permit the state to take over the 4,500 miles of new routes authorized by the Legislature."

About $3,443,000 gallons of road oil will be required to treat the sections included in the present program. Bids for supplying the oil and applying it on the roads are now being advertised for, and contracts will be let in the middle of June. Work will start immediately after the lettings.

The work includes projects in all sections of the state. Minnesota has more than 2,450 miles of bituminous surfaced roads in its trunk system.

Stretches of roads to be fixed up here are: 18 miles between Thief River and Red Lake Falls; 5 miles between Holt and Strathcona; 15 miles between Roseau and Greenbush.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

The desire for reckless speed is still in the minds of many drivers. Speed to get somewhere at a wild pace, although when you get there you have nothing better to do than turn around and return. Needless, heedless hurry. Cutting all corners, taking all the chances that might be taken, beating every light and signal, and driving like a demon through crowded streets.

Trying to pass everybody, talking, laughing, eating, drinking and the next minute a crash. Death!

What is the sense of it? Who is to blame? Such an occurance or description of speed is a common report in newspapers daily. The American public shrugs its shoulders and reads on.

Not until we arouse a safety consciousness in the minds of the entire public will such recklessness stop.

Smoke-Chasers Again on Duty in State's Forests

The "smokechasers" and the "tower" men are on duty in the north woods of Minnesota.

The annual "watch service" by the men for the scores of fires which usually break out at this time of the year and some of which keeps crew busy fighting them for weeks has started in the Superior national forest and other wooded sections in Northeastern Minnesota.

All of the "tower" men are in stations in the Superior and the several state forests in this section of the state, to remain in their high "homes" until late next fall.

The coming of young men into the federal forestry camps is looked on by forestry officials as an added measure in fighting any fires as telephones are to be connected with each of the six camps from lookout towers in the Superior forest. The six camps selected for the northeastern section of the state will extend from Little Marias north to the Canadian border and east to Lake Superior.

With the opening of the fishing season, forestry officials have issued warnings not to leave smouldering campfires. Others who go into the woods were urged to cooperate with the forestry men to prevent any fires this year.

Feed Variety Important

Variety in the dairy ration is very important. If an animal in good health loses its appetite, the ration usually lacks variety. When several concentrates are included in the ration, there is less danger of a lack of any certain kind of protein or mineral matter than when a smaller number is used. Two kinds of roughage, one a succulent feed and the other a good legume hay, are desirable.

Many Boys and Girls Will Attend Junior Short Course

If the advance registration is any indication of actual attendance, the annual Junior Short Course to be held at the Northwest School of Agriculture in Crookston, June 6 and 8 will shatter last year's record of 882 boys and girls who came from thirteen Northwestern Minnesota counties. H. A. Pflughoeft, district club leader, expects the total to reach 500 this year, as registrations and letters of inquiry are coming in increasing numbers.

The entire cost has been reduced to one dollar this year, so that every boy and girl between the age of twelve and twenty can afford to attend. Girls will receive special instruction in clothing, food preparation, canning, and home beautification under the direction of Miss Ratta Bede of the Northwest School faculty, and Miss Amy Wessel, state club agent.

Boys will receive instructions in various 4-H club crop and livestock projects by T. M. McCall, E. R. Clark, O. M. Kiser, A. M. Pilkey, and R. J. Christgaue of the Northwest School, H. G. Zavoral, livestock specialist, C. L. McNelly, county agent leader, together with county agents and agricultural instructors from some Red River Valley counties.

A special course of instruction for club leaders is also being arranged with T. A. Erickson, state club leader, and H. Pflughoeft leading the round table discussions.

R. J. Christgaue has announced county contests in kittenball, basketball, horseshoe and swimming. Other events include livestock judging, county music contests, and the "best groomed girl" contest.

Century of Progress Opens at Chicago

Ablaze with brilliant collor and throbbing with life, the big Century of Progress exposition swung into its allotted five months of existance on Saturday at the Michigan lake front in Chicago.

Solemnity and the spirit of carnival marked the opening day.

Inside the grounds, the large throngs split, thousands going into mammoth Soldier field for the dedicatory exercises; other thousands swarming into the exhibit halls and along avenues screaming with yellow, green, red, white and blue.

Postmaster General Farley, President Roosevelt's representative, signed a proclamation officially bringing the exposition to life.

The opening ceremonies were brief. Then the assemblage filed out of the amphitheatre to join those who had come, not for oratory, but to watch and wonder.

By noon the first day a crowd of over 60,000 had entered the grounds.

Lida Larrimore

There was about the Larrimore home all of the confusion and excitement that marks the wedding day of a favorite daughter. The only member of the family and group of friends that was not excited was Lida. She had two important things scheduled for the day. One of these was to get married, but before the ceremony could be performed she had to complete a story, and that story was "The Silver Flute."

So it was that this unusual romance was completed the day on which the author was married. It was certainly an appropriate day on which to complete so charming a love story.

Miss Larrimore first appeared as a novelist in 1928 with her Tarpaper Palace which won for her the warm admiration of a host of enthusiastic readers, and brought to her the almost universal acclaim of the critics. Each year since then she has produced a work which has strengthened her place among contemporary novelists in ever-increasing degree.

The Wagon and the Star, 1929, was another love story that proved even more popular than its predecessor, moving the New York Times, always critical, to say: "A book that satisfies that tender mood that wants lightness and youth and beauty; that wants to be stirred by the heartaches of love and its charm."

In 1930 her Mulberry Square reached an even larger audience than her preceding books, going into six printings, and this was followed by her current story, The Silver Flute, and which has still more securely fixed her place as a writer of widely popular romances of the type read with equal interest by all members of the family.

Fiction is not the only field to which Lida Larrimore has turned her talents to good advantage. She has twice written prize winning plays, and also has had several musical compositions published.

You will enjoy every chapter, every paragraph of "The Silver Flute" as it appears serially in these columns You will enjoy its humor, its pathos, its unusual plot and setting.

Federal Farm Board Passes Out of Existence

A news report from Washington states that the farm board, created as a major life-saver for agriculture at the ouset of the Hoover administration, passed out of existance late last week.

Its useable functions have been salvaged for merging into the new farm credit administration, run by Henry Morgenthau, Jr., one of President Roosevelt's big units in the "new deal" for the farmer.

The farm board's great wheat and cotton price stabilizing adventure is over and Morgenthau has estimated a loss to the government of $350,000,000 of the original $500,000,000 revolving fund.

A PLAN

Recently a customer of the bank described a certain farmer in this community with this expression: "He would get rich farming in the Desert of Sahara." Why is this man succeeding when his neighbors fail? He has a plan—uses his head, together with his hands. Everything about the farm is done on a schedule.

His cream checks and other incomes are regularly deposited in this bank. He pays by check. At the end of each month the bank renders a statement. Thus he has a complete record of his income and payments.

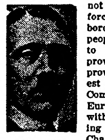
Roosevelt Calls on All Nations to Ban War and Disarm—Hitler Approves, Provided Germany's Equality Demand Is Granted.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S ringing call to all the civilized world to unite in outlawing war, in abandoning its weapons of offense and in agreeing not to send armed forces across national borders aroused the peoples of the earth to enthusiastic approval, and may well prove to be the greatest act of his regime. Coming as it did when Europe was on edge with rumors of coming wars and when Chancellor Adolf Hitler was about to make his first declaration of international policy, the reaction to Mr. Roosevelt's message was awaited with intense interest. Everywhere it was considered that he was directing his admonitions especially toward Germany and for twenty-four hours the absorbing question was "What will Hitler reply?"



Chancellor Hitler

The German chancellor had summoned the almost obsolete reichstag to hear the speech he had prepared in seclusion, and when he delivered it, it was found that he indorsed President Roosevelt's plan for a non-aggression pact and agreed to join it. At the same time, in ringing tones, he reiterated Germany's claim to equal armament and refused to adhere to a disarmament agreement, even if it were reached by a majority of nations, unless this demand for equality is fully recognized. Otherwise, he declared, Germany will withdraw from the League of Nations.

The chancellor agreed with Roosevelt that lasting economic reconstruction is impossible unless the armament question is settled, and accepted the MacDonald plan, indorsed by Roosevelt, as a basis for disarmament, but insisted any new defense system must be identical for Germany and the other nations. He promised to disband the German auxiliary police and also to subject semimilitary organizations to international control, provided other nations accept the same control.

Hitler declared his nation had suffered too much from the insanity of war to visit the same upon others, and denied that Germany contemplated invasion of either France or Poland. He demanded revision of the Versailles treaty, asserting that Germany had fulfilled the "unreasonable demands" of that treaty with "suicidal loyalty."

Officials of the State department in Washington said Hitler's speech was encouragingly conciliatory. In France it was not so well received. The French government was rather cool toward the Roosevelt proposals, and the fear was entertained in Paris that Hitler's approval of them would isolate France.

IN HIS special message to congress accompanying a copy of his dispatch to the nations, President Roosevelt thus summarized the peace plan that he had proposed for the world:

"First, that through a series of steps the weapons of offensive warfare be eliminated.

"Second, that the first definite step be taken now.

"Third, that while these steps are being taken no nation shall increase existing armaments over and above the limitations of treaty obligations.

President Roosevelt

"Fourth, that subject to existing treaty rights no nation during the disarmament period shall send any armed force of whatsoever nature across its own borders."

To the correspondents he said he had consulted no other governments concerning his project, and had confided the plan only to Secretary of State Hull.

The cablegram was a complete surprise to the chancelleries of the world, and the President's direct method of approach rather stunned some of them, especially the Japanese. The emperor of Japan, it was explained in the Tokyo foreign office, "never speaks with foreign nations on political matters and the foreign office cannot comment on communications to the emperor."

Prime Minister MacDonald, speaking at a dinner of the Pilgrims' society in London, praised the Roosevelt plan almost extravagantly, rejoicing that "henceforth America, by her own declaration, is to be indifferent to nothing that concerns the peace of the world."

In Italy, the Balkans and Mexico, as well as elsewhere, Mr. Roosevelt's proposals were received with warm approval, and Norway's cabinet was quick to be the first to accept them formally. Russia felt that the message might be the first step toward recognition of the Soviet government by the United States, so Moscow was pleased with it.

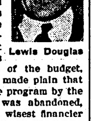
Opinion in the United States, as reflected in editorials in newspapers of all parts of the country, was that the President had made a bold and timely move to save the world from warfare, and that it had a chance to succeed; but there was some fear that he was trying to extend the Monroe Doctrine over all continents, and some doubt as to what his future course would be if his proposals were rejected. Generally, the President was highly commended for his energetic and enlightened action.

UNLESS Japan yields to the peace pleas of President Roosevelt and others—which is unlikely—the Chinese may burn both Peiping and Tientsin to prevent their use as bases by the invaders. Late dispatches from Shanghai said the defenders, already driven back to a point only a few miles north of the old capital, had planned to destroy both cities if they could not hold them. All the Chinese banks in Peiping had transferred their specie reserves to Shanghai, and British mining operations north of Tientsin had been stopped. Thousands of families had been evacuated from Peiping in the belief that a Japanese air attack would soon be made.

The navy office in Tokyo announced that the 1933 grand maneuvers of the navy would be held in "seas south of Japan," beginning early in June. Admiral Mineo Osumi, naval minister, explained that "there is nothing significant" in the fact that the maneuvers are being held in waters south of Japan. "Such a big event cannot be staged on the sea of Japan owing to the lack of space," he said.

RUSSIA'S new alignment with China was endangered by the Soviet proposal to sell the Chinese Eastern railway of Manchuria to Japan. The Chinese were enraged by this plan and called off the negotiations for a trade treaty with Moscow. Chinese papers claim that China is likely to retaliate against Russia with a boycott on Soviet oil, which has made serious inroads on the Chinese market in the last two years.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S big public works-industrial regulation bill finally was completed by his advisers and submitted to congress. It provides for a $3,800,000,000 construction program with which it is hoped depression will be routed and the industries of the nation put on their feet.



Lewis Douglas

How this immense sum will be raised was left to the ways and means committee of the house to decide. Mr. Roosevelt conferred with Lewis W. Douglas, director of the budget, and thereafter it was made plain that the plan to finance the program by the issue of greenbacks was abandoned, though Senator Glass, wisest financier in the Democratic party, had said he preferred that to any form of taxation, despite his general opposition to inflation. The President was informed that congress would not stand for a sales tax to provide the $220,000,000 required during the first year for interest and amortization charges.

The bill, as drafted by Director Douglas and others, would authorize the following construction works:

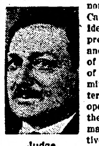
1. Public highways—$400,000,000, of which $250,000,000 would follow the present allocation and $150,000,000 would be for extensions.
2. Public buildings—No set limit.
3. Naval construction—$100,000,000 maximum.
4. Army, including equipment and possibly a huge airplane flotilla should the disarmament conference fail—$100,000,000 maximum.
5. Slums and housing following the pattern of the United States Housing corporation of war days—No set limit.
6. Natural resources, including soil and erosion work, forestry and similar projects—No set limit.
7. Loans to railroads for maintenance and equipment—No limit.

PRINCETON university was thrown into deep mourning by the death of Dr. John Grier Hibben, president emeritus, who was killed at Woodridge, N. J., when his automobile collided with a truck. Mrs. Hibben, who accompanied him, was severely injured. Doctor Hibben, who was born in Peoria, Ill., in 1861, was educated at Princeton and the University of Berlin. He succeeded Woodrow Wilson as president of Princeton in 1912 and retired in June last year. He ranked high as an educator and as author of works on philosophy.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT notified Rufus C. Dawes, president of the Century of Progress, that he would be unable to go to Chicago to open that great exposition on May 27. He added that he hoped to attend the fair before it closes. Notwithstanding this disappointment, the exposition will be formally opened on the date named above, and the intensive activity on the grounds gave assurance that it would be practically completed and ready for visitors at that time.

THREE members of the American delegation to the world economic conference in London have been selected by President Roosevelt. They are Secretary of State Hull, chairman; James M. Cox of Ohio, once Democratic candidate for the Presidency, and Senator Key Pittman.

SITTING as a court of impeachment for the eleventh time in its history, the senate began the trial of Federal Judge Harold Louderback of the northern district of California. Vice President Garner was president of the court and Henry F. Ashurst of Arizona, chairman of the judiciary committee, served as master of procedure. The opening statement for the prosecution was made by Representative Hatton W. Sumners of Texas, chairman of the house judiciary committee. The proceedings took up the day sessions of the senate and it was believed the trial would end by May 27.



Judge Louderback

Judge Louderback is standing trial on five articles of impeachment charging him with irregularities in receivership cases. It is alleged that he displayed favoritism in appointing receivers, that he appointed incompetent persons, and ordered them paid exorbitant fees.

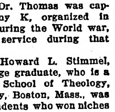
One article claims that he appointed a telegraph operator as receiver for a three million dollar motor company; another that he forced an expert receiver out of office because the receiver would not comply with his orders to select a particular attorney.

EXECUTIVES representing twenty-nine of the leading life insurance companies that hold farm mortgages called on Henry Morgenthau, Jr., in Washington and told that chairman of the farm board that, while they were desirous of helping in the successful administration of the emergency farm mortgage act, they were opposed to any general writing down of mortgages or their wholesale exchange for federal land bank bonds under the terms of the emergency legislation.

For refinancing the outstanding farm mortgages the land banks under the direction of the new farm credit administration are authorized to issue up to $2,000,000,000 of bonds which may be sold or exchanged for mortgages held by the insurance companies and others. Loans on or exchanges of bonds for these securities may not exceed 50 per cent of the "appraised normal value" of land mortgaged plus 20 per cent of the insured improvements, however, and Mr. Morgenthau recently said that "in order to effect an exchange of first mortgages for bonds it is anticipated that in many cases the amount of such mortgages will have to be curtailed to come within the sum which can be loaned."

It was the consensus of the executives that most of their mortgages had been conservatively written and that in justice to their policyholders they should not make additional sacrifices of assets to losses sustained during the last four years. The opinion prevailed that the companies should continue to carry their farm mortgage holdings pending a return of increased land values to come with the general prosperity which they felt was not far off. Meanwhile the companies would continue avoiding foreclosures wherever possible and decide individual cases on their own merits.

SOME time ago the senate called on the secretary of agriculture for information concerning grain speculating on boards of trade. Mr. Wallace has just reported in response, and he says that big speculators in wheat futures in the grain pit were short "on an average five days out of every six" from April 1, 1930, to October 22, 1932.



Sec'y Wallace

In his report, Wallace declined to give the names of persons and firms short 1,000,000 bushels or more during the last "two or three years" on the Chicago Board of Trade, as asked by the senate. He explained the grain futures trading laws prohibited release of this information.

A total of 769 trading days covered in his report, Wallace said, showed "the big speculators, as a group, were predominantly on the short side of the wheat futures market.

"As a group, their net position as of the close of the market each day was short on 643 days, or 83.6 per cent of the time, and long on 125 days, or 16.4 per cent of the time, and one day evenly balanced," Wallace reported.

President Peter B. Carey of the Chicago Board of Trade said the information presented to the senate is "simply a repetition of data assembled by Dr. J. W. T. Duvel, chief of the grain futures administration, in an effort to retain his bureaucratic job."

AIR laws for the world are being drafted at an international conference on aerial legislation now in session in Rome. The rules adopted will be embodied in an international agreement and will be applicable in all adhering countries. The delegation from the United States is headed by John C. Cooper, Jr., chairman of the committee on aeronautics of the American Bar association.

News of North Dakota

EVENTS OF THE WEEK THROUGHOUT THE STATE TOLD IN BRIEF FORM

Jamestown.—Daniel Gutschmidt, 21, died from the effects of burns received when a gas pump exploded.

Kulm.—The 1934 session of the North Dakota conference of the Evangelical church was held in Kulm from May 24 to 27.

Cando.—F. D. Butcher of the United States department of entomology visited in Towner county recently and spent the time in going over the grasshopper situation.

Minto.—William Rutter experienced a new kind of thievery. When going to his granary he found the door open and upon investigation he estimates that approximately 100 bushels of grain had been taken.

Fargo.—J. C. Penney, head of the nationwide Penney retail organization, visited in Fargo recently. Mr. Penney is known as the "man with a thousand partners," there being nearly 1500 Penney stores today.

Grand Forks.—John C. West, superintendent of Schools in the city of Grand Forks was recently named president of the University of North Dakota. West succeeds President Thomas F. Kane, who resigned.

Selfridge.—Warrants were issued against William Nagel, former mayor of Selfridge, for the removal of personal property subject to a tax lien from the state. Nagel and his family recently moved to Minneapolis.

Mayville.—Shoppers in Mayville trade territory are soon to be given an opportunity to become better acquainted with the many bargains offered in Mayville. On May 31, Mayville will hold a special market day.

Glenburn.—Henry Olson is in Trinity hospital suffering with two broken legs. Olson was operating his tractor and had stopped to adjust some piece about the machine back of the tractor, the clutch suddenly took hold and moved the machine back onto him.

Devils Lake.—Northwestern university at Chicago paid homage to its eight beauty queens as the 1933 Syllabus, yearbook, appeared on the campus with their pictures one of its principle features. Among the eight girls was Lillian Clausen of Devils Lake.

Grafton.—The Hart-Parr company established a business firm here in the Fisher building. A complete line of Oliver farm equipment will be handled by the new concern and Hart-Parr tractors will be kept in stock here.

Rugby.—A real "fugitive from a chain gang" recently visited with Judge Grimson; he was George W. McSpadden of Austin, Texas. McSpadden is on a tour of the United States to gather up all material he can regarding the chain gang system.

Harvey.—The elevator property of John Guthschmidt was destroyed by fire recently, loss being estimated at $12,000. Two thousand bushels of grain and $2,000 worth of feed, flour and seed contracts were consumed by the fire.

Buxton.—Leonard Hanson, 46, cashier of the First National bank here, was shot, dying about ten minutes later, by bandits that looted the bank of about $1,000 in cash. Hanson disobeyed the command of the bandit to "stick 'em up."

Grand Rapids.—The twenty-seventh annual convention of the LaMoure County Sunday School association will meet here May 28. A full day's program has been arranged for the convention with a picnic lunch during the noon hour.

Ellendale.—Dr. H. E. Thomas, Ellendale dentist, died unexpectedly of heart disease. Dr. Thomas was captain of Company K, organized in Dickey county during the World war, and also saw service during that period.

Jamestown.—Howard L. Stimmel, Jamestown college graduate, who is a student at the School of Theology, Boston university, Boston, Mass., was one of the 13 students who won niches in the 1932-33 Hall of Fame of the university.

Marion.—Vivian McKay, junior in the school of education, was received as a new member to the Blue Key, honorary national service fraternity, at the recent Recognition day convocation. Election is based on character, scholarship, leadership, and service to the college.

Grafton.—Jacob Miller, known as the Rushford township hermit, 80 years old, was found dead in his two-room shack two miles north of Pisek. A search of the clothing of Miller revealed $740 in bills sewed in the lining of his clothing. Miller had been dead a couple days.

West Fargo.—Plans are nearing completion for the construction of stockyards here by the South St. Paul Union Stockyards company. It is expected the plant will cost some $250,000, with plans to expend about $100,000 at the beginning of construction work.

Enderlin.—Fred G. Oehlke of Enderlin has been appointed county director of the Greater North Dakota association for Ransom county for the coming year.

Fargo.—Dr. Peder Jensen, utilitarian officer at the U. S. Veterans hospital, Fargo, wrote the resolution that started poppy day sales. Once he saw scarlet poppies glittering between the crosses on the fields of Flanders and he never forgot them. His resolution was adopted by Edward B. Rhodes post, No. 2, American Legion, Tacoma, Wash., Feb. 22, 1922.

U. S. Wheat Crop Poorest Recorded

Prospects in Ohio Indicate Larger Yield Than in Years 1926-1930.

Prepared by Ohio State University Agricultural College Extension Service. WNU Service.

Prospects for the winter wheat crop in the United States are the poorest on record, while the crop in Ohio promises to be better than average, according to crop reports received by the department of rural economics at the Ohio State university.

No other important winter-wheat growing state has prospects approaching the average for the years 1926 to 1930. Estimates place the Ohio crop at 31,650,000 bushels, which is 4,500,000 bushels larger than the average for three years.

Kansas, Nebraska and Oklahoma, the three leading winter-wheat producing states which produce nearly half of the total crop, report prospects of a one-third average crop. These three states together expect to harvest less than 100,000,000 bushels. Their average harvests totaled about 260,000,000 bushels.

Crop reports estimate the total crop for the country this year at 334,000,000 bushels. Average crops in the period of 1926 to 1930 were 590,000,000 bushels.

About two-thirds of the total wheat crop in the United States is winter wheat. Spring wheat makes up the other third.

Brighter Outlook Now Seen for Corn Market

United States corn will meet less active competition in world markets this year because of prospective short supplies of Argentine corn and the market reduction in the South African crop, it is expected by the bureau of agricultural economics.

The Argentine corn crop is forecast at 264,000,000 bushels, against 293,000,000 bushels produced in 1932, and the record harvest of 420,000,000 bushels in 1931. Stocks of old crop corn are low, with supplies for export estimated at approximately 8,000,000 bushels as of March 1, says the bureau. Shipments during March were about 7,600,000 bushels.

The bureau says shipments during the next Argentine corn crop season will have to be drawn principally from the new crop. The quality of the crop is reported as satisfactory, although rain interrupted harvesting in some areas. Supplies of corn in the United States are reported as materially greater than a year ago, although farm consumption is reported heavy.

Soybeans for Brood Sows

Soybeans may be safely fed to brood sows during the gestation period at the rate of one-half to three-fourths of a pound per head per day, and during the suckling period at the rate of one pound a day. Those who have soybeans available for that purpose will not have to buy tankage or other protein supplements. There appears to be no danger of the pigs producing soft pork even if their dams are fed soybeans. On the other hand, after the pigs are weaned and are fed for market, they should not be given soybeans at all—not even in small quantities—as that produces soft pork. Those who have not grown soybeans for hogs in the past should bear in mind that their use for brood sows is permissible. Whenever soybeans are fed to brood sows or used as a protein supplement for cattle, a common mineral mixture composed of one-third by weight of ground limestone, bonemeal and common salt, should be supplied. The reason is that soybeans are deficient in mineral matter, especially in comparison with tankage.—Wallace's Farmer.

Learn to Use Explosives

Agricultural use of explosives, a new departure in the technique of tilling the soil, is being taught Alabama farmers by the agricultural extension service of Alabama Polytechnic Institute. Principal uses thus far shown the farmers include blasting of boulders and stumps that impede the progress of farm implements. Use of dynamiting to control erosion will be taught later, according to plans announced.

Farm Hints

There are more cows on farms in the United States now than ever before.

* * *

Farmers of ancient Rome used smudge fires to protect their gardens from frost.

Farmers all over Oregon are preparing to use some of the trees obtainable from the state forest nursery in planting windbreaks, shelter belts and woodlots.

FIND OPEN ROADS ON "AIR HIGHWAY"

The Graf Zeppelin still plies placidly between Germany and Brazil. North Americans who have seen the dirigible as a war craft haunted by tragedy, and who scarcely think of these great ships at all as vehicles for ordinary civilian travel, would be surprised to discover what a solid reputation dirigibles bear, in regions far to the south. Working with planes, the Graf has linked jungles with Europe and made highways above desolate savannas. On the boundless llano, deep in the selva, whence the nearest railroad is a thousand impassable miles away, in places where even a rough trail cannot survive the rainy season, men talk, nevertheless, of catching the plane to make the next trip from Pernambuco. They literally drop into town with their families, including babies, wearing bygone fashions and little acquainted with streets. In only two parts of Bolivia can one count on being able to find roads open—on the altiplano and in El Valle—but even in that land one can rely upon the air. People who have never heard a "talkie" nor taken a train, carefully consult air bulletins in the local cantina. Ranchers, mining, coffee, sugar and cattle men, who customarily voyage by mule, are familiar with the flying schedules.

Every day the Lloyd Aereo Boliviano announces proximate flights from Cochabamba, metropolis of a vast and otherwise closed agricultural region. On Sunday and Tuesday planes fly to Santa Cruz, and thence "on the first and third Fridays of the month" to Puerto Suarez on Lake Caceres, and Corumba on the River Paraguay, this last hop taking at least four and a half hours. From Corumba passengers may continue by rail and plane or by plane alone to Sao Paulo, then up the Rio and so to Pernambuco and Europe in one grand sea swoop. This has been going on calmly since the fall of 1931, with no accidents. The thought of airships does not alarm the natives of interior South America. Their neighbors use them and return intact.

The town hall clock struck briskly, seven ringing notes. Barbara drowsily opened her eyes. She knew, without remembering why, that it was a happy day. What was it? And then she remembered. This was her birthday. Today she was eighteen years old.

Lying there, her brown hair tumbled against the pillow, her brown eyes bright with pleasure, she saw the happy day unfold. At breakfast there would be presents from Father and the children. They never could bear to wait until later in the day.

Mr. Tubbs, the postman, would bring her godfather's gift. That, every birthday, was exciting—a gift from someone she hadn't seen since she was a baby being christened and whom, of course, she couldn't remember at all. Stephen Drake—"Uncle Stephen." His taste in gifts was charming. But he wasn't exactly a friendly person. He never answered her "Thank-you" notes or the cards she sent him at Christmas.

And she was going on a picnic, a very exclusive picnic, just she and Bruce and a basket of lunch in Bruce's rattle-trap car. Barbara smiled, a gay little smile that woke a sleeping dimple. She knew why Bruce had suggested a picnic for her birthday. He was conspiring with Father and the children. They wanted her party tonight to be a complete surprise.

Presents, a picnic, a party! If only Mother were here. . . .

A shadow dimmed, for a moment, the happy prospects of the day. Mother had loved parties and secrets and surprises. Barbara felt a lump in her throat and her lashes misted with tears. She hoped Mother knew they were all together again in the gray-shingled Provincetown house, that Father hadn't married anybody as Aunt Josephine said he would, that Kit wasn't as lame as he used to be, and Gay was a beauty, and Jamie was a dear little boy with freckles all over his face. Mother had loved them all so much. She hoped that Mother knew. . . .

The house was coming to life. Downstairs in the kitchen Martha was banging stove-lids and noisily clattering pans. There were sounds overhead in the attic where Kit had quarters of his own. Barbara popped out of bed.

We sail the ocean blue
We catch-a da plenty-a fish—

she hummed as, fresh from a shower, she brushed her soft brown hair. Perhaps she should "do it up" now that she was eighteen. But the pins wouldn't hold and the curly ends kept slipping out of the knot. She tied a ribbon around her head and let the shoulder-length mop swing free.

Thinking of Bruce, she bent toward the mirror. He said her face was the shape of a heart. It was, she discovered with a feeling of pleased surprise. And he said her eyes were like pansies, sometimes, soft and velvety brown, but that, sometimes, they turned into shining dark stars that did something queer to his breath. The girl in the mirror flushed and Barbara's cheeks felt warm. Silly! Bruce was teasing, of course. He said the same sort of things to Gay.

Barbara was never "a beauty" like Gay. Her nose tilted up and her mouth was too wide. But, at least, she was pretty today. Her cheeks were flushed and her lips were red and her eyes were dark and shining. Only her skin was too fair to tan nicely, and always, in the summer, there were freckles across her nose. Bruce said—Gracious!—Why couldn't Bruce MacLain keep out of her private thoughts? . . .

"Happy birthday, Bab!"

Barbara turned from the mirror. Gay stood in the open doorway, poised like a butterfly about to light.

Gay was fourteen. She had bright brown curls foaming all over her head, and hazel eyes, with long curled lashes, and her skin was the tawny pink and gold of an apricot in the sun. She knew she was lovely, Barbara thought. But that was Aunt Lola's fault. . . .

"Aren't you excited?" Gay asked in her fluty voice.

"Terribly," Barbara answered. . . . What should she wear? Clothes for a picnic. Sandals and socks. The old brown skirt. Gracious! There was a dreadful rip in her favorite yellow jersey. . . .

"What do you suppose Uncle Stephen will send?"

"I can't even imagine." Barbara buckled her sandals, smiling because Gay called her godfather "Uncle Stephen" in that familiar sort of way. The children all called him "Uncle Stephen." The story of her christening never lost its charm. They liked Father to tell them about the village in southern France, the church with its bright-robed saints, the strange young American whom Father had invited to be her godfather. But he wasn't a "young" American now. He must be as old as Father. . . .

"Something nice, I suppose. Uncle Stephen sends lovely gifts."

"Beautiful," Barbara agreed, searching for a needle and thread to mend the rip in her jersey. A present every birthday. "Uncle Stephen" never forgot the fifteenth of October. He had remembered, too, that babies grow into little girls and little girls grow up. The gift, each year, was appropriate to the birthday. . . .

"I wish I was eighteen."

"What would you do?" Barbara sat, tailor fashion, on the sea-chest beneath the window, mending the rip in her jersey with long uneven stitches. "What would you do, Gay Thorne, if you were eighteen years old?"

"I'd marry somebody very rich," Gay answered dreamily. "I'd have a squirrel coat and a limousine and a bell to ring for the maid."

"You'd better learn to spell, first!"

That was Kit. Barbara glanced toward the door. Kit was pulling on a sweater and his head, when it popped through the sweater's neck, was a dark tousled mop, darker than Gay's or her own, dark like Father's and wavy, too. All the Thornes, Barbara thought with a certain degree of complacence, had naturally curly hair.

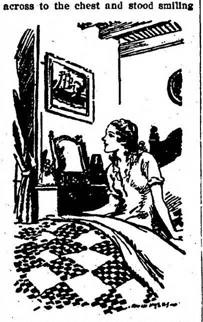
Kit—Christopher, for Father—was sixteen and tall for his age, as Martha said, no amount of feeding would "put any meat on his bones." His eyes were hazel, like Gay's, and his lashes were almost as long. He hated it when ladies said, "What a sensitive face!" and he tried to make himself healthy and strong, exercising with dumb-bells, swimming, rowing a boat. He could draw, but he was shy and embarrassed about the things he did.

"A child like you!" Kit frowned severely at Gay. "You'd better learn something before you talk about getting married. What do you think, Babs?—she spells stomach with a 'k'!"

"I guess that doesn't matter," Gay said airily. "I guess if I married somebody rich, I never would have to spell."

But she looked embarrassed, Barbara thought. She hated Kit to think she was less than perfect.

"Happy birthday, Babs!" Kit walked across to the chest and stood smiling at her, a flush in his thin dark cheeks, his hazel eyes very bright. "Lots of happy birthdays." He stooped and kissed her shyly, just touching the tip of her ear.



Today She Was Eighteen Years Old.

She couldn't answer just then. She looked down at the needle which seemed suddenly to have blurred. Kit's limping walk brought a lump into her throat. He was the nicest one of them all. It wasn't fair that he should have to be lame. But certainly he was better. There had been two years, when he was a child, that Kit hadn't walked at all. . . .

Kit and Gay left her. Barbara looked out through the window, across the harbor to the horizon where the water seemed to meet the sky in a dazzle of shining blue. She saw them all grown up, Kit and Gay and Jamie.

Kit would be a famous artist with paintings in all the exhibitions and the newspapers making a fuss. Gay probably would marry somebody very rich. Jamie would be a naturalist, perhaps. His pockets were always stuffed with toads and starfish and things.

And Barbara? She would stay in Provincetown with Father. Father could paint the things he liked, when the children all were grown. Bruce would come in the summer and take her swimming and play his guitar for her and dance with her, evenings, at the "Ship." And maybe some time. . . .

Barbara bounced off the chest and pulled on the jersey with a jerk. "Silly!" she scolded herself. "When it comes to making up nonsense, you're exactly as bad as Gay!" But the scolding was not effective. It failed to cool her scorching cheeks or hush the birds in her heart.

Footsteps sounded on the stairs, Jamie's footsteps, sturdy and independent. Barbara met him in the hall. Jamie was clean, for a wonder—but then it was early in the day. "Chips," the small yellow dog, was frisking wildly around his feet.

"Babs," Jamie said a bit breathlessly, "Martha says for goodness sake will you please come down to breakfast before the muffins get cold."

Barbara kissed the messenger and gave him a hearty squeeze. But Jamie wriggled away. He was twelve years old and objected to being kissed.

They were waiting for her at the foot of the stairs, Father and Kit and Jamie and Gay. A chorus of "Happy Birthdays!" rose to greet her, beautiful wishes with wings. Barbara smiled her gayest smile and her sandaled feet did skipping steps to a little tune of their own. Presents, a picnic, a party! Because she was happy and loved them so much, she sang as she danced down the stairs:

We sail the ocean blue
We catch-a da plenty-a fish—

Martha came out from the dining room. Her face was the picture of woe.

HOME WORK

A couple of men had been out pretty late the night before and they were comparing notes the following day. "My wife lectured me for half an hour. How did you get along with yours?"

The other man groaned miserably. "You got off light," he said. "You don't know what it's like to be married to a schoolteacher. She didn't say much when I came home but she looked me in the eye and made me sit up till I had written out 'I must be home every night by nine o'clock' 100 times on a slate."—Pathfinder Magazine.

Smith got married. The evening of his first pay-day he gave his bride $14 of the $15 salary and kept only a dollar for himself.

Till Tomorrow

"I'M SORRY," said the young man, barring Dorothy's progress across the little foot-bridge that spanned the roadside brook, "but I'm here to stay. You see, I'm related to Charlie Parkins."

"Well, so'm I. I mean, so'm I going to stay, and so'm I related."

Dorothy sat down on the rocky bank. She looked across the bridge to the Parkins shack. Paradise—and she couldn't get to it.

The young man looked at Dorothy. Lovely girl, she seemed, but he'd be darned if she was going to put anything over on him.

"You see," he repeated, "Charlie Parkins knew I was coming up today. And he warned me against intruders."

"This place practically belongs to me today," Dorothy said. "And I think you're the intruder. And I'd be really very grateful to you if you'd please go away."

"I'm staying." Bob Stowe had become stubborn.

"I'm staying, too. And I think you're awfully rude. There's special reason why I—I've got to stay."

A suggestion of tears in the violet eyes, now. Well, reasoned Bob, probably stage tears. He wouldn't give in.

But—"I suppose you could stop here and rest a bit if you're tired," he said grudgingly. "You seem to have brought your lunch. I'll take some crackers and cheese and go off by myself."

Dorothy watched him out of sight between the trees. Then she sighed, picked up her two baskets, and went over to the little shack and turned her thoughts resolutely to the work before her.

Two hours later she heard the crackle of twigs that announced the return of the young man.

"Well," he said, "you still here?"

She did not answer him.

"You'll have to go, you know. I'm camping here for a week."

"I'm going." The girl rose from her seat. "I'll go right away. Do you mind if I leave my lunch? I—don't want it."

Bob Stowe looked at the lunch Dorothy pointed to. Spread on a card table—boned chicken, jelly, a salad, sandwiches, a vacuum bottle of coffee. Two places, untouched.

"But it's three o'clock—and you've not eaten. Of course, I don't mind your leaving that lunch. But—" He looked closely at the girl—pale and tired, she seemed. "You know, I'm sorry I was rude. I mean—lots of people picnic here. Charlie's always having trouble with 'em. That's why I told you to get out. But—" he looked with embarrassed interest at the tempting lunch—"I wish you'd stay and finish up. I'll make it right with Charlie."

"I'm sorry." She sobbed. "But it's just the last straw. I'm just no good at all. First, I come out here and bring this lunch, and wait all afternoon for Charlie—and he doesn't turn up. And then—you don't believe me."

"Poor girl," said Bob Stowe. "Tell me what it's all about."

"Well—give me your handkerchief, will you? Mine's sopping. You see, I knew Charlie pretty well. He and I had a date for this afternoon to come out here. Then we had a quarrel. He said I wasn't practical. But I am. I made this lunch myself! And he didn't come."

"Don't worry," said Bob. "Charlie's a good sort. Maybe I can help straighten things out. You care a lot for him, don't you?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Well—let's—I mean, you'd better eat something."

"Yes—let's." The girl smiled through her tears.

Half an hour later, over cigarettes, Bob pulled the conversation back to their absent host. After all, Charlie deserved some sort of break.

"See here," he said, "we've got to do something about Charlie. I mean, it isn't quite fair to him. No matter how much of an idiot he's been. I'll explain. And then—"

The girl laughed softly.

"But, you see," she said, "Charlie's my brother! And he thinks I don't know anything. I wanted to prove I could get a good lunch, but he didn't come. And he forgot to tell me about you."

The air cleared for Bob. "Charlie's a brute," he said. "He told me to come up here for a week's camping. And he said to tell any picnickers I was his brother or something. But he forgot to tell me about you."

"But I know about you now," said Bob. "And will you come up every day for lunch while I'm here?" He was helping her pack her things back in her car.

"Yes!" She smiled. "Yes. I'll come—every day."

He resolutely took his eyes away from her and let her start down the rocky, winding road.

"Tomorrow," he called, as her car turned from sight around a curve. She couldn't hear him, of course. But his shout made tomorrow seem nearer. Well, this would be a great vacation. Then Bob Stowe laughed. "And I came for solitude," he thought. "Bet it's a put-up game on Charlie's part, not turning up this afternoon, and sending—Dorothy—up. He said I'd find this place like a tonic."

He looked down the empty road again. "Till tomorrow," he shouted.

Fine Art of Soup Making

Flavoring Is Real Test of Success or Failure in Preparation.

Soups are always a subject of controversy and discussion and they certainly do vary in quality.

They depend for flavor a good deal upon the appreciation of this point by the cook who makes them, as seasoning them properly is an art. I can give the foundation recipe but the final touch of flavor is up to the person who prepares them.

I have been asked for a recipe of Russian borscht, that vegetable soup whose principal ingredients are cabbage and beets. It takes its special character, however, from the sour cream, sometimes whipped, which is added at serving time. It is a delicious soup for luncheon, where it practically provides a full course. With it are sometimes served small pastry turnovers stuffed with well-seasoned meat.

Still another requested recipe was for a tomato soup—a very general request—for there are at least half a dozen different kinds, from a clear tomato bouillon to a thick potage. Probably the request refers to the favorite tomato bisque, which is made like all cream soups, with one exception. Cream soups are made by flavoring a smooth white sauce with strained cooked vegetable pulp, and please note—seasoning it very well. A bit of onion, a bay leaf, or a few cloves may be cooked with the tomato. After the tomatoes are strained and before they are added to the cream sauce, a dash of soda and a little sugar should be added. This prevents the sauce's separating.

After the soup is blended, add additional seasoning to taste. Here is where the last touch of seasoning makes the soup interesting. This applies, of course, to all soups as well as to tomato. Look at your pantry shelf and put those bottles of sauces and boxes of spices to good use to give the soup that extra flavor, delicate but individual.

Split Pea Soup.

1 pint split peas
2 quarts cold water
1 small onion, sliced
2 stalks celery
2 teaspoons salt
Pepper
¼ teaspoon mustard
Cayenne
3 tablespoons butter
1 lemon, thinly sliced
2 tablespoons grated horseradish

Soak peas overnight. Drain and add cold water, onion, and celery. Simmer three or four hours until peas are soft. Rub through sieve. Reheat, adding seasonings and butter. Garnish with lemon. Black beans may be used instead of peas.

Russian Borscht.

2 tablespoons butter
1 small onion
1 quart meat stock
1 cup minced beets
½ cup minced carrots
¼ cup celery, minced
1 cup cut cabbage
1 potato
3 fresh tomatoes, or
1 cup canned tomatoes
½ cup sour cream
Salt and pepper
1 tablespoon vinegar

Mince onions and fry in butter until light brown. Add to meat stock with other vegetables. Simmer two hours, season with vinegar, salt and pepper. Serve and add to each serving one tablespoon sour cream.

Cream of Tomato Soup.

1 pint milk or white stock
2 tablespoons flour
2 tablespoons butter
1 pint tomatoes
1 bay leaf
Salt and pepper
2 slices onion
3 cloves
1 teaspoon sugar
¼ teaspoon soda

Make a white sauce of the liquid, flour and butter. Cook the tomatoes with seasoning until tender, and rub through a sieve. Add the sugar and soda to the tomatoes and gradually add the tomatoes to the white sauce, stirring constantly. Serve at once.

About Handsditch

Hundsditch is a fine and well-known street of London but there is a strong sentiment for a change of the name. In the old days it followed the ditch that encircled the outer walls of the city, and an ancient historian remarked that the ditch was "a filthy place full of dead dogs."

The SILVER FLUTE

A Charming and Unusual Romance

—by—

LIDA LARRIMORE

Barbara Thorne, after becoming engaged to Bruce MacLain, is left, by the sudden death of her artist father, in charge of the family fortunes. Reluctant to accept assistance from well-meaning but wholly unsympathetic relatives, Barbara decides to take her entire "family"—Kit, Gay, Jamie and even Chips, the dog—to visit her unknown Godfather.

The fact that Stephen Drake, the Godfather, is only forty and a decidedly eligible bachelor, comes as a surprise to Barbara, and when Stephen falls in love with her the situation verges on the brink of tragedy—for Bruce is waiting at home for Barbara, and Emily Trent had her heart set on Stephen.

Miss Larrimore has told a tender, charming story with all the gaiety, humor and pathos that have made her novels so notable.

And it all ends happily as all love stories should, and as you would have it end.

Huot Memorial To Be Dedicated June 25th

The monument at Huot in Red Lake county commemorating the signing of the treaty of 1863 by which 11,000,000 acres were ceded by the Chippewa Indians to the United States government, will be dedicated Sunday June 25, according to a news bulletin received from Crookston.

This memorial commemorates an important date and event in the history of the Red River Valley when in 1863 a Treaty was signed at Old Crossing ceding a large part of Northwestern Minnesota and Northeastern Dakota to the whites.

The Pembina and Red Lake bands of the Chippewa Indians were represented by their chiefs and headmen. Former Governor Alexander Ramsey headed the U. S. Commission.

The Memorial which is a life size bronze statue of a Chippewa Indian was erected by the U. S. Government under the terms of a bill passed by Congress. Red Lake County donated the site of nine acres to the State as a park which will be known as the Old Crossing Treaty Park.

Tee meeting on June 25th will be a family picnic affair with two bands present, to be followed by short program of speeches. Dr. T. C. Blegen, President of the Minnesota Historical Society, will give the principal address. In addition there will be talks by representatives selected by North Dakota, Minnesota, the Chippewa Tribe and local groups.

A gravaled highway leads to Hout from Red Lake Falls and via Gentilly from Crookston. Committees from Red Lake Falls and Crookston Commercial Clubs have the affair in charge. A large attendance is expected to be present at this significant historical meeting.

HOME RAMBLES

Those who contend that the old earth is flat, are now charged with being in the same shape financially. ✠ We can say that the Marshall County Fair is going to be a big affair. ✠ The cream production is climbing. ✠ Butterfat prices are holding out steady. ✠ The grass is growing so fast that you can hear the straws crack. ✠ The cows are busy turning it into money.

Don't go around hanging your underlip like a motherless colt. ✠ They only give you a poor old horse-laugh for such a look. ✠ Now is the time to plan where you are going to spend your next fortune. ✠ Save out a $1.50 for us and we won't worry.

The Weather

The weather the past week been ideal for growing crops. Last Thursday night we had a noisey electric storm and strong wind with a few big hail. We also had a rain. Sunday night we had a nice rain and Wednesday evening we had a soaker.

The rest of the week has been clear and sunshine.

"Injuns"

THOSE who now-a-days seldom hear about or see a real Indian and, therefore, rather naturally take it for granted that our Indian population has dwindled to a mere handful probably will be somewhat astonished to learn that there still are more than 343,000 of them within our borders.

Beginning with Ababco and running through the alphabet past such better known names as Cherokee, Chinook, Choctaw, Crow, Flathead, Fox, Hopi, Iroquois, Kickapoo, Mohawk, Navaho, Osage, Pawnee, Pueblo, Seneca, Sioux, Tonkawa, Ute, Winnebago and Yuma down to Zuni, and including many lesser-known bands such as Cathlakaheckit, Chilliecittequad, Kwethtlmanish, Mishikhwutetmune, Paspikawati, Prinashauwagotsito, Tuziyammos and Yaudanchi, a bulletin issued by the office of Indian affairs at Washington lists some 344 tribes still in existence.

Each of our forty-eight states and the District of Columbia has some citizens who are still classed as Indians. Oklahoma leads the list with about 119,000—approximately one-third of the total number. Other states which rank high are, Arizona with 43,327, California with 13,333, Minnesota with 13,326, Montana with 12,648, Washington with 10,920 and Wisconsin with 10,498. Vermont has but 24, West Virginia 7 and Delaware 2.

According to the bulletin, Uncle Sam conducts 184 well-attended Indian schools, while some 30,000 additional Indian scholars are enrolled in various state public schools. In addition, more than 5,000 are provided for in mission and private schools.

Large Crowd Attended Prize Drawing Here Saturday Nite

One of the largest crowds that has ever attended the prize day drawings here, was in attendance on Saturday evening. It was estimated that over five-hundred people came here to enjoy the band concert and take in the prize drawing.

Hanson, the handyman of the old burg, was chief announcer and being in the advertising game he soon grasped the golden opportunity of telling the large crowd about the band, the home town, the prize drawing and the Marshall County Fair.

There are not many towns the size of Holt that give you a lot of free entertainment and then distribute $500 in prize in one year to the people who trade at home.

The individuals whom play in the band, both business men and others and Rev. Redal the director, are sacrificing a lot of their time and money in giving the people of Holt and community this class of entertainment. You people can show your appreciation for what they are doing by coming in for all concerts and give them a big hand.

Strange accidents happen that are difficult to explain. An elderly woman died from a fall incurred when she tripped over a pair of overshoes.

A creeping child was blinded when he pulled an electric cord from a coffee urn and the contents were spilled over his head.

A woman was killed and her two sons were injured when a bee flew into the window of their car and caused the woman who was driving to steer the car off the highway into a tree.

It is difficult to tell when an accident card will be dealt to you. Always be careful and avoid unnecessary dangers and never take a chance. A chance should never be taken if an accident is possible or a life is involved.

Some people pride themselves on the fact that they have taken chances and accomplished unusual results in speeding or other adventures. It requires only one accident to pass into eternity if it is fatal, and you cannot afford to take the chance.

International Luther League Convention To Be Held At Fargo June 30 to July 4

The international convention of the Young People's Luther League, to be held at Fargo June 30 to July 4, will be the seventh of its kind, according to a survey over the history of the League. Present plans for the 1933 convention point toward the best convention that the organization has held.

The Young People's Luther League was organized at the union convention of the Norwegian Lutheran church in June, 1917. It comprises about 2,000 organized leagues and young people's societies with a membership of over 100,000. It is divided into 10 District Leagues, and into 95 circuit leagues, of which 10 are in the Northern Minnesota District.

General conventions were held triennially until in 1925, after which biennial conventions have been in procedure. District conventions are also held biennially on the years in which the international sessions are not held. Circuit conventions are held annually.

The first international convention was held at Red Wing, Minn., May, 1919, with an attendance of approximately 18,000. The second was at La Crosse, Wis., in 1932 with delegates from every section of the church present. The 3rd triennial convention took place in Minneapolis, Minn., during the Nors-American Centennial in 1925. Others have been held at Seattle, Wash., in 1927; at Duluth, Minn. in 1929; and at Chicago, Ill., in 1931.

The Choral Union, which includes the church choirs and choral societies of the church, is affiliated with the Luther League, and is doing much to reawaken interest in choral and hymn-singing. It has separate conventions or sangerfests. Its greatest convention was held at Seattle in 1927 at the time of Luther League convention, at which 1,400 singers were registered.

The Young People's Luther League has its own budget and also gives financial support to the church body to which it belongs. It has been particularly interested in foreign missions, having raised a considerable amount also for a church extension fund. The purpose of the League, according to constitution, is: to establish the young people firmly upon Luther's triple foundation, the Word alone, Grace alone, Faith alone; to cherish in them interest in all that is true and good; and to foster among them Christian fellowship in the service of Christ and the church. The official publication is the Lutheran Church Herald. Better Leagues is also issued as a quartely.

A student organization, called the Lutheran Students' Union, affiliates with the League, with a separate membership of about 4,000, and an annual separate convention.

Sunday School Picnic

The Sunday school classes of Nazareth Lutheran church will hold their annual Sunday school picnic at the Skomedal park two miles east of Steiner on Sunday, June 11.

The parents of all the Sunday school children are invited to come and bring their dinner for the whole family.

Giveing-Engstrom

Miss Selma Giveing, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Art Giveing of Goodridge, and Elmer Engstrom, son of Mrs. John Engstrom of Holt, were united in marriage at Thief River Falls Saturday night, June 3. Rev. Fjelstad performed the ceremony. Miss Alida Eliason and Mr. Casper Jones were the witnesses.

Mr. Engstrom is at present a mechanic in a garage at Goodridge. He spent his boyhood and early manhood at his home on a farm near Holt. Later he was employed at the Engen Garage.

The News extends best wishes to the happy couple.

To Warren on Business

Arthur Conklin, Matt Lunke, Albert Klungness, Manvel Moe, H. O. Hanson and Theo. Ness motored to Warren on Monday to meet with the county board about some road work they wished to have done between Holt and East Valley townships.

The county is not doing much road work this year and this project will also lay over until next year.

Held Annual Meeting

The stockholders of the Holt Holding Company held their annual meeting on Tuesday afternoon and checked over their books and reports for the past year and elected their officers.

O. H. Nohre is president of the board of directors. Theo. Ness is secretary and Geo. Fricker treasurer. Ole Lunke and John Sorum are directors.

Wedding Dance

A free wedding dance will be given at the Henry Clauson farm five miles north and two miles west of Goodridge, on Saturday night, June 10, in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Engstrom. Music by Kenneth Moen. Everybody invited.

Free Canning Demonstration At Middle River on June 22

Mrs. A. L. Carlson, Mrs. H. O. Hanson, Mrs. C. F. Lindholm and Mrs. J. P. Augustine made a trip to Middle River on Wednesday to attend a meeting with Miss Calister of the State Board of Control. Two representatives from each township and village in Eastern Marshall county attended the meeting.

The purpose of the meeting was to make arrangements for a free Home Canning Demonstation to be held at Middle River on Thursday, June 22. Of great interesest to women of this community will be the demenstration of drying of green garden vegetables, which will include drying of string beans, green peas and other greens.

There will be only two demonstrations held in this county and a large number of women from Holt and the surrounding townships will attend at Middle River as it will be the one nearest to their home, the other demonstration will be held at Stephen.

Miss Ostrander of the Home Extension Division of the University of Minnesota at St Paul, expert on canning of vegetables will be in charge.

Free Band Concert

The Holt Community Band will give a free concert in the bandstand Tuesday evening, June 13, beginning at 9 o'clock p. m. The time is set at 9 o'clock to give all farmers a chance to attend.

A PLAN

Recently a customer of the bank described a certain farmer in this community with this expression: "He would get rich farming in the Desert of Sahara." Why is this man succeeding when his neighbors fail? He has a plan—uses his head, together with his hands. Everything about the farm is done on a schedule.

His cream checks and other incomes are regularly deposited in this bank. He pays by check. At the end of each month the bank renders a statement. Thus he has a complete record of his income and payments.

May we help you in the same way?

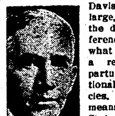
United States Pledges Aid for Peace and Security—J. P. Morgan Questioned by Senate Committee—Plan to Finance Public Works Program.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

RESPONDING to a demand for a clear statement of the policy of the United States in the matter of peace and disarmament, Norman H. Davis, ambassador-at-large, announced to the disarmament conference in Geneva what seems to many a revolutionary departure from traditional American policies. Apparently, it means that the United States has abandoned isolation, neutrality rights and the freedom of the seas. Specifically, Mr. Davis pledged his government never to interfere with international action against a nation that has been satisfactorily identified as an aggressor, and to participate in "effective, automatic and continuous" international supervision designed to make certain that the nations carry out their promises in disarmament.



N. H. Davis

"President Roosevelt's message," he said, "is a clear indication of the fact that the United States will exert its full power and influence and accept its just share of responsibility to make the results in disarmament definite, prompt and effective."

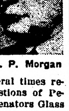
After announcing that the United States was willing to consult with the other states in case of a threat to peace, Mr. Davis set forth the American policy in these words:

"Further than that, in the event that the states, in conference, determine that a state has been guilty of a breach of the peace in violation of its international obligations and take measures against the violator, then, if we concur in the judgment rendered as to the responsible and guilty party, we will refrain from any action tending to defeat such collective effort which these states may thus make to restore peace."

Asserting that there must be real accomplishment in the way of disarmament, or a reversion to a race in arming, Mr. Davis proposed drastic arms reductions, and promised that the United States would go as far in this as the other states.

Great Britain, Germany and Italy were highly pleased with Mr. Davis' pronouncement, but France remained dissatisfied, both with the security offered by the United States and with the Davis proposals for armament reduction. The more the French get, the more they demand, and their obstinacy is exceedingly irritating to the other nations. Foreign Minister Paul-Boncour told the conference that France would not reduce her armaments unless a definite system of mutual assistance is created, supplemented by genuine supervision of armaments. The supervision, he said, must especially cover armaments which are manufactured in private factories.

INVESTIGATION of the private banking firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., greatest of its kind in America, was started by the senate banking committee with J. Pierpont Morgan, senior partner, as chief witness. The proceedings were conducted by Ferdinand Pecora on behalf of the committee and attracted a throng of spectators. John W. Davis, former Democratic Presidential candidate, was there as counsel for Morgan, and the banker was several times relieved from nagging questions of Pecora by the protests of Senators Glass and McAdoo. Most interesting to the public of the facts brought out was that no income tax whatever was paid by Morgan or any of his nineteen partners for 1931 and 1932 and that they paid an aggregate of only $48,000 in 1930. This was because of heavy losses sustained by the firm. Morgan could not recall whether he personally paid any tax in 1930, but counsel for the investigators said he did not. Morgan repeatedly answered "I do not know" to Pecora's queries about a $21,000,000 loss written off his firm's books on January 2, 1931, in addition to other deductions which already had wiped out taxable income.



J. P. Morgan

Finally the banker asked Leonard Keyes, office manager of the firm, to explain the matter.

Keyes said the involved transaction was the inevitable result of a revaluation of assets made necessary by the admission of a new partner, S. Parker Gilbert, on January 2, 1931.

Pecora hammered away with questions, but Keyes, a methodical appearing man who spoke crisply and without hesitation, repeated his account over and over. He testified that the $21,000,000 loss could, as the law then stood, have been deducted from the firm's taxable income in 1931, 1932 or 1933. Three or four million dollars of the $21,000,000, he said, was deducted from profits in 1931—a year in which the partners paid no tax—but none in 1932, when the firm "had loss enough."

On the second day the senators heard about Morgan & Co.'s "preferred list" of friends to whom the firm sold Alleghany Corporation common for $20 a share when the market price was $35. In this list were many well-known names, including William H. Woodin, now secretary of the treasury; Charles Francis Adams, later secretary of the navy; Senator McAdoo, Newton D. Baker, John W. Davis, Gen. John J. Pershing, John J. Raskob, Silas H. Strawn and Col. Charles A. Lindbergh.

Another list revealed included the names of bank officers and directors to whom the Morgan firm had made loans. Some of these loans had been repaid, but many had not, and in the latter category the largest was a little over $6,000,000 to Charles E. Mitchell, former president of the National City bank of New York, whose trial for alleged income tax evasion was going on in New York city.

FEDERAL JUDGE HAROLD LOUDERBACK of California was acquitted in the impeachment trial in the senate, but he escaped by a narrow margin. On the fifth and most comprehensive charge 45 senators voted guilty and 34 for acquittal. But under the constitutional impeachment procedure a two-thirds vote is necessary for conviction.

IF THE administration and its supporters in congress have their way, the $3,300,000,000 national recovery bill, providing for regulation of industries and construction of vast public works, will be financed by increased income and gasoline taxes and higher income imposts on stock dividends, as well as the continuation for one year of all the nuisance taxes levied in the revenue bill of 1932. That was the way it was reported to the house by the ways and means committee, and though the Republicans and some others objected to these taxes and fought for a sales tax, that is the way it is likely to become law.

Hugh S. Johnson

The sum of $220,000,000 annually will be needed for interest and amortization of the public works bond issue, and the committee decided this should be raised by:

1. Increase of the normal income tax rates from 4 to 6 per cent on the first $4,000 of net income and from 8 to 10 per cent on all above $4,000. This levy is estimated to raise $46,000,000 a year.

2. Extension of the new normal income tax rates to dividends now subject only to surtaxes and taxation at the source. Estimated to yield $83,000,000 a year.

3. The addition of another three-fourths of a cent to the present 1 cent a gallon federal tax on gasoline. Estimated to bring in $92,000,000 annually.

These additional taxes, the report said, "are temporary in character and may be eliminated by proclamation by the President when operating revenues exceed operating expenditures, or when the repeal of the Eighteenth amendment opens a new and ample source of revenues to the government."

To administer the industry control features of the measure when it becomes law, President Roosevelt has selected Hugh S. Johnson of Moline, Ill., and he has been busy getting an organization in shape so he can go to work promptly. He had a large part in formulating the bill.

A close associate of Bernard Baruch, Democratic leader and New York financier, Johnson was a member of the old war industries board. He was also head of the first draft board during the World war and since then has had extensive experience in manufacturing. He was born in Kansas in 1882. He turned to the army for a career and was graduated from West Point in 1903. When he retired in 1919 he was a brigadier general.

EXPANSION of credit rather than of currency has been started by the government under the powers given the President in the farm act. Secretary of the Treasury Woodin announced that the federal reserve banks had made an initial purchase of $25,000,000 of government bonds in the open market.

"That is the start of an inflationary step," Woodin said. "It is being done to inject something into the market. In other words, to keep things moving along."

Woodin said additional purchases would be "entirely dependent upon conditions." The new law authorizes the reserve banks to buy up to $3,000,000,000 of securities.

When the reserve banks buy bonds cash balances of member banks are increased by equal amounts. The administration hopes that the banks with these additional funds on hand will advance them to industry."

WHEN President Roosevelt asked the nations of the world to agree to a tariff truce pending the outcome of the London economic conference, the administration thought it would not be in accord with good faith to assess now the processing taxes on wheat, cotton and perhaps corn and hogs provided for in the farm relief act. But Secretary of Agriculture Wallace thought otherwise, and after a conference with Secretary of State Hull he was permitted to go ahead with this undertaking. Probably there will be protests from Europe and Canada, and then the diplomats must get busy.

Secretary Wallace and George N. Peek, co-administrator of the farm relief act, selected Guy C. Shepard of Evanston as administrator in charge of the packing house products under the act. He will have general charge of trade agreements between packers and between producers and processors relative chiefly to hogs and their products. Mr. Shepard was formerly vice president of the Cudahy Packing company.

To handle the cotton work under the farm act C. A. Cobb of Atlanta, Ga., was named. He is editor of the Progressive Farmer-Ruralist. Both he and Shepard rank alongside of Prof. M. L. Wilson, appointed wheat administrator some time ago.

NEW YORK state came to the fore in favor of prohibition repeal in a manner that surprised even the ardent wets. The vote was about twelve to one throughout the state, and in New York city it was approximately forty to one. The 150 delegates elected to the convention all are pledged to repeal, and they will meet in Albany on June 27 to execute the will of the people. The Empire state will thus become the sixth to ratify the repeal amendment to the Constitution.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT asked of congress the suspension of the law requiring the governor of Hawaii to be an actual resident of the islands. He said:

"It is particularly necessary to select for the post of governor of Hawaii a man of experience and vision who will be regarded by all citizens of the islands as one who will be absolutely impartial in his decisions on matters as to which there may be a difference of local opinion.

"In making my choice, I should like to be free to pick either from the islands themselves or from the entire United States the best man for this post."

REPORTS from China, confirmed by the foreign office in Tokyo, said that an agreement for a Chinese-Japanese truce in the north China zone had been reached and was about to be signed. The Chinese defenders of Peiping already had withdrawn from that city and the Japanese were only a few miles away. It was understood that the truce required the Chinese troops to remain south of a line running from the Great Wall north of Peiping southeast to Lutai on the coast, the line passing north of both Peiping and Tientsin. Thus the Japanese would establish the buffer zone which they demand between China and Manchukuo. The Chinese understood this zone was to be administered by Han Fu-chu, governor of Shantung province, and Hwang-fu, national government representative at Peiping.

Despite the reported truce there was renewed fighting at the walled city of Tungchow, 13 miles east of Peiping.

PEACE in Cuba seems to be a long way off, though the government continues with vigor its efforts to wipe out the revolutionists. And, according to the latter, President Machado is using more than vigor. Operations against the opposition are being directed by Maj. Arsenio Oritz, Machado's chief military strategist, and he is pursuing the same tactics with which he terrorized Oriente province in 1931. In Santa Clara and Camaguey provinces he has been hanging captured rebels to the trees along the highways and in the towns, and it was reported that he held as hostages the family of Carlos Leyva, who led a rebel raid on Taguasco, threatening to kill them unless Leyva surrendered with fifty followers. Then Oritz returned to Sancti Spiritus, and it was believed he would pursue the same ruthless methods in that section.

WITH a stately parade down Michigan avenue, speeches by Postmaster General Farley and others and much picturesque ceremony, A Century of Progress, Chicago's World's fair, was formally thrown open to the public, and thousands of men, women and children entered the vast exposition area and marveled at what had been accomplished. By high pressure work the fair was already virtually completed.

The most thrilling and dramatic part of the proceedings came at nightfall, when through a "hook-up" of three astronomical observatories a ray from the star Arcturus was caught by telescopes, transmitted to the exposition grounds and used to put into operation the gorgeous lighting system of the fair. According to the scientists, the ray started from Arcturus just forty years ago, at the time the fair of 1893 opened.

The fact that Chicago has created this exposition during the depression is as impressive as the fair itself.

Elgin.—A wind storm took a toll of four lives in the Harold Lamb family, 13 miles southwest of Elgin. The parents and five children were in the house when the storm struck, completely destroying the home. Mr. and Mrs. Lamb and a son, 18, were injured, but not seriously.

Kenmare.—The Kenmare fire siren went on a rampage a few minutes after 3:00 a. m. one morning, resulting from a short circuit. The firemen were awakened from their slumber and many citizens also ventured out to see the fire.

Bismarck.—Striking common laborers employed on the new $2,000,000 North Dakota capitol building, injured two skilled laborers that were being transported to the building. Nine deputy sheriffs attempted to protect the workers seeking to reach the structure.

The Plan That—

By DUFORD JONES

"MY DEAR, you won't do anything like that!" Margery said, smiling tenderly into the flushed face above hers.

"But I am going to marry you, though—"

"Stanley, boy, I'm just as determined to have you, but it is better if when we are married we leave no unhappiness behind us. I know just how your mother feels about your marrying the daughter of an ordinary factory worker. Your mother has lived all her life among lovely, pleasant, cultured things, and she has a right to feel that I am somewhat crude and—"

He swung her from her feet and kissed her. "No more of that. Mother is obstinate as a—a—"

Margery freed herself. "Don't you be the same. Listen, my dear, let's think it over; then if we fail, we'll—we'll just do it."

He smiled with relief. "All right, then, honey, but you'll have to do the thinking. But I'll give you just two weeks—and then I'm going to grab you and run away with you—family or no family."

The plan that had popped into Margery's head while they were talking over the situation looked a bit desperate, but as she told herself, "Desperate cases call for desperate remedies." She talked the plan over with her father. He laughed and then looked serious.

"Little girl, your second name as I've told you is Mischief, but go ahead. I have faith in you. If it doesn't work, nothing will be lost," he agreed.

From that moment Margery worked with speed. Stanley had said in passing that his mother's companion, Miss Knapp, was getting through; so Margery hastened to see her.

"I'll help you. The old lady is a fearful old aristocrat. I had enough of her, and I doubt your luck; but, anyway, I'll recommend you for my position," Miss Knapp agreed.

So it came about that Margery, late that week, walked into the fine Landon mansion and was interviewed and hired. She then planned to tell Stanley what she had done, but found he had left a hurried word for her that he had been rushed South by his firm on an emergency trip.

Margery's sense of humor came readily to her aid those first days of her service as companion to Mrs. Landon. The old lady was exacting, but Margery met the issue without evasion.

She liked to read herself, so her duty of reading to Mrs. Landon for two hours each day was not a task. She liked to play with nice dishes, and she found herself, instead of the cook, preparing pet dishes that Mrs. Landon liked. She anticipated her employer's needs as much as she could, and that she was successful was indicated by Mrs. Landon's brief statement, one afternoon:

"Miss Elder, you are proving very satisfactory, and I would like to make your engagement permanent."

Margery smiled outwardly, although she said "Thanks be!" inwardly. "I am glad to have it permanent," she answered demurely enough.

She wrote to Stanley in care of his firm, and she was sure he knew what was going on; but on that fatal afternoon she discovered otherwise.

She came from the back of the house and stepped into the library where he was talking to his mother. He glanced up and saw her and his eyes opened with astonishment, and his mouth—

Margery, back of Mrs. Landon, put her finger on her lips, and she saw that he had "tumbled."

Later, he cornered her in the kitchen. "You witch, this was your game. Gosh! its a good one," he chuckled. "Mater was praising you just as you came in. But when she finds out—Oh, golly!" he grinned. "It'll be worth it just to have you around here."

Then began a time of doubt for Margery. She discovered that Mrs. Landon's fear about the girl her son wished to marry rose, after all, from her great love for her son. Actually, beneath her cold, aristocratic exterior was something that approached closely a warm heart. Most of the time, however, she seemed rigid and set in her ways and ideas.

Margery began to be worried. The truth must come out sometime, and the plan she had entered upon began to look a little childish.

The bottom fell out of the plan suddenly. She was going along the upper corridor when Stanley, stepping from his room, caught her, and gathered her in his arms. She gave him a kiss in return for his, then tried to pull away—and saw Mrs. Landon looking at them down the hall. Stanley saw her at the same time, and Margery felt his arms tighten.

"Gosh, mother saw us. Now for an earthquake!" he whispered in her ear.

His mother approached, and to Margery's astonishment, she was smiling.

"So I am to lose my companion. My dear, forgive me for deceiving you, but Miss Knapp felt she ought to tell me; so I have known from the beginning. I have enjoyed having you here and I hope you and Stanley will want to stay with me right along," she said a bit wistfully.

Stanley reached out a long arm and drew his mother to him. With the other he encircled Margery's waist. "We accept the invitation—and a kiss all around seals the bargain!" he announced with joyful finality.

How About Arithmetic as Science of Truth?

The professor thought he was clever, but one day he met his match.

"Arithmetic," he commenced his lecture, "is a science of truth. Figures cannot lie. For instance, if one man can build a house in twelve days, twelve men can build it in one day."

A quick-witted student rose to his feet.

"Yes?" he said; "then 288 men can build it in one hour, 17,280 in one minute, and 1,036,800 in one second. I'm sure one of them couldn't lay a brick in that time."

While the class and the professor were still gasping the student went on:

"Again, if one ship can cross the Atlantic in six day, six ships can cross it in one day. That's not possible, either. Where's your truth in arthmetic? I don't think you know what you're saying?"—London Answers.

Washing Woolens

To be safe, test new woolens for color fastness before washing, by squeezing a sample or inconspicuous portion in lukewarm water for five minutes or so.

For the washing, briefly: make rich, lukewarm or cool suds with mild, neutral soap flakes. Put in the garment and wash quickly, by gently forcing the suds through and through the material. Never allow colored woolens to soak, even for a few minutes, nor to remain rolled up, or in a heap while wet.

Rinse the garment thoroughly in lukewarm or cool water. Squeeze out the water, or put it through a wringer, adjusted loosely. Don't twist. It is helpful, where practical, to roll woolen garments in a dry turkish towel to absorb the excess moisture. Then ease into shape and dry at moderate temperature.

SYNOPSIS

—2—

"Sing before breakfast, you'll cry before night," she said in a warning voice.

That set them all to laughing. Martha's face was so droll!

* * * * * * * *

Barbara sat with Father in the sun on the wide front steps. The children had gone to school. Mr. Tubbs, the postman, had left the mail and gone whistling on his way.

Lovely day! October in Provincetown, Barbara thought, was the nicest month of the year.

"What time is it, Babbie?" Father asked.

She knew he was teasing. He asked every five minutes so she could consult the watch "Uncle Stephen" had sent. She had to admire it often, the delicate carving, the ribbon strap, the sapphire in the stem.

"Half-past ten," she answered and then, pleased and excited, her voice like a shaken chime of bells, "Isn't it beautiful, Father? How do you suppose Uncle Stephen knew I wanted a watch?"

"The man is a magician."

Father was smiling at her. She thought how handsome he was, his hazel eyes, his thick dark hair, his lean straight body that made him look so young. Kit looked like Father but Kit was more grave. He would never have Father's ringing laugh, his happy-go-lucky charm.

"What does Aunt Josephine say?" Father indicated the letter that lay in Barbara's lap.

"She told me to take care of my complexion, as that was my one claim to beauty."

"What else?"

Barbara hesitated. There were, in the letter, many references to Father and none of them were flattering.

Father relieved her embarrassment. "She said she hoped you weren't growing up like heathen"—his eyes twinkled wickedly—"though that, perhaps, was too much to expect since Christopher Thorne has no more idea how to bring up children than a crow in a corn field knows about running for congress."

"How did you know?" Barbara asked, surprised.

"I am familiar with all of her similes." Father lit a cigarette. "Directly or indirectly, I've heard them many times."

Barbara looked down at the letter. The writing on the envelope recalled the brick house in Providence, the elms and the urns on the lawn, Aunt Josephine herself, majestic and awe-inspiring. She seemed to hear Cousin Evie's twittery voice agreeing with Aunt Josephine no matter what she said, the solemn important ticking of the grandfather's clock in the hall.

Aunt Josephine was Mother's aunt. Barbara had lived with her two years after Mother died when the children had been parceled out among the relatives and Father had gone away. It wasn't a happy two years. Aunt Josephine didn't approve of artists. She didn't approve of Father. Barbara, remembering, sighed. She had missed the children so much.

Three years of being together again hadn't made her forget. Sometimes, even now, she thought, for a dreadful moment, that they were separated. . . .

"What are you thinking?" Father's voice, blessedly near, routed the dismal thoughts of those past times.

But she didn't tell him about them. It didn't seem quite polite. Father might think she didn't trust him. He had promised that they should never be "parceled out" again.

"I was thinking," she answered instead, "that the harbor won't look the same when the Ariel isn't there."

They saw her swaying at anchor, her sails gleaming white in the sun, Mr. Loring's sloop, the Ariel, beautiful as a dream.

"Jim is leaving tomorrow." Father spoke regretfully. "He asked me to go for a farewell sail this afternoon."

"That will be nice."

Barbara was glad for Father. He loved sailing and boats. The ships he painted were the pictures people bought. "Tripe," Father called them. They weren't as nice as the things he did before Mother died. They were up in the attic collecting dust. People preferred the ships.

Father's attention strayed from the Ariel.

"Babbie," he asked, taking a letter from his pocket, "do you remember Mr. Schwartz?"

"That dreadful old man with the whiskers?"

"Be more respectful, young lady." Father pretended to be stern. "He was an angel in disguise."

"Why?" Barbara asked, thinking that old Mr. Schwartz looked less like an angel than anyone she had ever seen in her life.

"He's building a swanky home, a castle on the Rhine. No, not the Rhine"—Father consulted the letter—"the Hudson, to be exact, and he wants ship panels in his library and—"

"Father! He wants you to paint them!"

"That's the reward for being polite to gentlemen with whiskers."

"Father!" Barbara was bouncing with excitement. "We can buy the rest of the house and put in a heater and mend the roof and—" A gulp stemmed the torrent of words. The prospect of sudden riches had taken away her breath. "Father," she urged when she had found it again, "go send him a telegram right away."

"I'm going."

Father swung down the walk and hurdled the picket fence. Barbara, watching, saw him turn down Pearl street, bare-headed, the wind tossing his hair. How young he looked and healthy and brown.

Lovely day! Oh, everything was so nice! They could finish buying the house. Dear Mr. Schwartz! She loved even his whiskers. Aunt Josephine's letter couldn't bother her now. But it was a blot on the day. She would bury it out of sight.

She found a stick and scooped out a hole under the willow tree. That was the end of Aunt Josephine. She heaped up the earth and stuck in a twig for a headstone. . . . She tried to compose her features and think of a dismal hymn!

"Hello, there—Happy Birthday!"

Barbara looked up from Aunt Josephine's premature grave. She felt her heart beat faster. Bruce was unlatching the gate.

* * * * * * * *

The picnic basket was packed with lunch. The presents had been displayed: Father's coral necklace, Kit's water color of the willows, Gay's slipper buckles, the window box Jamie had made, filled with vines and blossoming plants. Bruce had admired them all. He had heard about old Mr. Schwartz who had turned out to be an angel in disguise.

Now he was in the kitchen talking secrets with Martha. Barbara had tactfully remained in the living room. Waiting was difficult. Why didn't Bruce hurry? It was after eleven o'clock!

She looked at herself in the mirror above the book shelves set in its frame of tarnished gilt. The freckles were growing fainter, she thought.

The kitchen door opened and there was Bruce. Bruce tanned a lovely color, she thought, sort of golden brown, too, like beech leaves in the fall. His eyes were blue. That was always surprising. You expected them to be brown. They were smiling, crinkling at the corners. . . .

"Do you like her?" Bruce asked.

"Do you?" She whirled around, bold as brass because it was her birthday.

"She's pretty nice." His eyes said more than that. Or maybe she just imagined it. You couldn't tell about Bruce. . . .

"Are you ready?" He came into the room with the basket of lunch.

"I've been waiting hours!" She didn't feel bold any longer. She felt sort of happy and shy.

They went out through the dining room door, under the arbor that led from the house to the studio, under the swaying willows.

"Babbie—" Bruce stopped suddenly and set the basket on the grass.

Barbara stopped, too. She looked up at him wonderingly. His eyes weren't smiling now. They looked at her so strangely. . . .

"Did you think I hadn't brought you a present?" he asked.

"I didn't know."

"Would you have minded if I hadn't?" he said gravely.

"I couldn't have borne it," she answered.

"Shut your eyes and give me your hand."

Barbara screwed her eyes together and held out her small right hand. She knew the present was a ring before he said she might look. Such a lovely ring! It was made of twisted gold and from a tiny clasp in the center hung a small gold heart which made a tinkling sound whenever she moved her hand.

"Bruce!" She lifted her face, flushed and starry-eyed, framed in blowing tendrils of soft brown hair. A smile that was close to tears trembled across her lips. "Bruce!" she marveled. "It just exactly fits!"

"It should," he said. "It was made for you. The heart is to match your face."

They were silent for an interval. The wind in the willows was a song that was happy and sad. Barbara moved her hand and heard the tinkling of the heart. She wanted to thank him. She couldn't find words. She looked down at the grass, afraid she was going to cry.

Bruce saw the droop of the curly head. What was she thinking? Did the ring mean more to her than a birthday gift?

"Babbie—"

A low little laugh broke the spell of sunlight and shadow and the willows' sad sweet song. Barbara raised her head. Her face sparkled with mischief.

"Gracious!" she cried. "We're standing on top of Great-aunt Josephine's grave!"

Heavier Than Lead

The old phrase "heavy as lead" could be changed to "heavy as osmium," for the latter metal weighs twice as much as lead.

How I Broke Into The Movies

Copyright by Hal C. Herman

By BILLIE DOVE

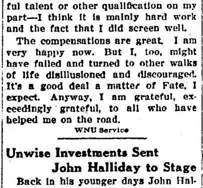
AMATEUR theatricals, physical culture and dancing were the avenues by which I reached the screen.

I was born in New York, where I was educated. In one of the schools I attended, physical culture was taught religiously and I became very proficient, partly because I enjoyed the exercises. From this it was an easy step to dancing.

Then it was discovered that I "screened well." That means, in movie parlance, that one has a face that registers favorably before the camera. Not always is this the case and sometimes a very beautiful face will not photograph satisfactorily. It seems to be something for which there is no real explanation, you either screen well or you don't. I was fortunate.

I studied and took part in amateur theatricals in my high school days.

It took me just four and a half years, however, to reach any eminence in the films. My first role was with Constance Talmadge in "Polly of the Follies." To Lois Weber, I owe much of my success in attaining what we are pleased to term "stardom." My greatest chances came with two of her films, "The Sensation Seekers" and "The Marriage Clause." Then I had a marvelous opportunity when I played the feminine lead with Douglas Fairbanks in "The Black Pirate." "The Lone Wolf Returns" gave me another opportunity and finally came my contract with First National pictures. At first I was featured—later came stardom. The initial picture under this contract was "An Affair of the Follies." Then came "The Tender Hour" and with "The Stolen Bride," I was starred. I have since made "American Beauty" and "The Love Mart." The latter is a George Fitzmaurice production and a beautiful story of old New Orleans. More recently I starred in "The Night Watch," "Yellow Lily," "Adoration" and such talking picture as "Careers" and "Her Private Life."



Billie Dove.

What shall I say to the thousands of girls who seek a career in pictures? Must it be "Don't?"

I hate to say that, in a way, because I hate to discourage ambition, and yet, as I look back over even my brief career, think of the innumerable disappointments, the difficult work, the innumerable problems, I wonder if I would be justified in advising anyone to try it. Of course, I have been treated with consideration by the producers, directors and associate players. I have no complaints to offer in that respect. It is merely that the work is exacting and that the competition is very keen. All one's fortitude and courage are needed in the long months and years that must precede any sort of success. And then, of course, not many do succeed. I don't put that down to any wonderful talent or other qualification on my part—I think it is mainly hard work and the fact that I did screen well.

The compensations are great. I am very happy now. But I, too, might have failed and turned to other walks of life disillusioned and discouraged. It's a good deal a matter of Fate, I expect. Anyway, I am grateful, exceedingly grateful, to all who have helped me on the road.

Unwise Investments Sent John Halliday to Stage

Back in his younger days John Halliday was a gold prospector and did well at it. He joined the army of gold hunters in the bleak Nevada deserts. That adventure brought him close to a half-million, which he duly lost in the Sacramento stock market. Stranded in that city, he joined Nat Goodwin's repertory company and a few years later played the lead in a world tour with T. Daniel Frawley. Back on Broadway, he played with John Drew, in "The Circle" and later appeared prominently in "The Whip," "Sour Grapes," "The Spider," "Jealousy" and other plays. Mr. Halliday began his screen career with "Scarlet Pages" and then appeared in "Captain Applejack" and "Fifty Million Frenchmen." He was placed under contract to RKO-Radio Pictures and since then has been seen in, among other pictures, "Smart Women," "Consolation Marriage," "Transatlantic," "The Ruling Voice," "Men of Chance," "Bird of Paradise" and "The Age of Consent."

Closes Safety Pin in Baby's Stomach

Chicago.—One of the most skillful surgical feats in Chicago medical history has saved the life of ten-weeks-old Marilyn Zeigmund.

Several days ago as Mrs. Benjamin Zeigmund was bathing the child she laughed at the baby's antics and dropped an open safety pin she was holding in her mouth. The pin fell into the child's mouth and was promptly swallowed.

Dr. Gustave G. Herpe, of Lakeview hospital, who was summoned, decided the baby was too young for an operation. He waited two days, and still the pin remained in the stomach.

Then Doctor Herpe cut an incision into the abdomen. Taking the stomach in his hand, he deftly manipulated it until the pin was closed. With the principal danger removed, he replaced the stomach, closed the incision, and pronounced the baby out of danger.

MINER TAKES GOLD SECRET TO GRAVE

Even Partner Unaware of Location of Find.

Seward, Alaska.—A $500 gold nugget, with considerable quartz clinging to it, indicating it had broken from a vein and had traveled but a short distance; the immediate death of the prospector who found it, have added another lost mine to the long list which has engrossed the attention of adventurers throughout the world.

The find was made somewhere on Rapid creek, a tributary to the upper Kuyokuk river.

The slab of gold was found by a prospector known as "Bill." His partner managed to learn that the nugget was found up Rapid creek.

For weeks search has been made for the rich vein, but no one has succeeded in unlocking nature's secret.

The upper Kuyokuk is famed for its coarse gold and the disadvantages accompanying the miner. The gold is found for the most part high up on benches rather than in the stream beds laid down after the passing of the polar ice.

It is only by building snow dams and impounding water that sluicing water may be obtained. This being in small quantities the mining season is short.

Yet the old timers of Alatna, Bettles, Kockrines and other points manage to filch from $5,000 to $30,000 each during this short season.

The scene of operations is approximately 700 miles northwest of Fairbanks, about half of the distance necessary to be negotiated between Skagway and Dawson in the memorable stampede of 1898.

To reach it by water entails a trip via the Kuyokuk, where it enters the Yukon at Grimkopt. It costs 22 cents per pound to have supplies hauled in by scow, towed for much of the distance by horses owing to the swiftness of the upper Kuyokuk, and the rapids of the Alatna river, which enters the Kuyokuk just north of the Arctic circle.

Road's Rolling Stock Is Disappearing Bit by Bit

Glendale, Calif.—Added to other problems of the distracted railroad companies, it would appear, is a new worry, discovered by Patrolman P. R. Moore, of the Glendale police department.

Several days ago as Officer Moore was making his rounds in the vicinity of the railroad yards here, he noticed that a box car standing on one of the remote sidetracks, was partly missing.

The next day some more of the same car was gone. Making a mental note on the apparent rapid deterioration of box cars, the officer looked at it again next day.

He found only the steel chassis of the car left, all four sides and the roof having gone the way of all box cars, sooner or later. He reported to police headquarters with the observation that some itinerant had probably decided to build a home here. New "homes" in the vicinity are being checked by the police.

Builder Makes Use of Cave Age Conveniences

Acton, Cal.—Here in the southwest corner of the great Mojave desert, where a man gets only what he gets with his hands, cave age conveniences have found a practical use in the year of progress, 1933.

S. C. Chappel, homesteading a mountain claim, has set up housekeeping in a hillside cave until he clears his land and builds his own house.

And he lauds its convenience, what with an abundant water supply at hand in the Santa Clare river.

He even conducts a little business.

He recently entered into an agreement to build a home for a neighbor homesteader—before he builds his own.

"Total Eclipse" Fatal

Southampton, Eng.—"Total eclipse. No sun. No moon. All dark, all dark, amidst the blaze of noon," sang Alec Campbell, twenty six years old, tenor, giving the opening words of Handel's "Total Eclipse," in a competition. He collapsed and died later.

Five Hefty Women in Family

Tyler, Texas.—There are only five members (all women) in the Bickley family, but it's the largest aggregate in Smith county. Their aggregate weight is 948 pounds.

Milks for Use in the Kitchen

Research Work Has Shown Food Values to Be Much Alike.

"I have noticed that you have sometimes used evaporated milk when giving inexpensive menus. Is evaporated milk as good as sweet milk and can it be used instead of it in any recipe? I always thought that some of the food value was taken out of it?"

This paragraph is quoted from a letter to a dietetic expert, who comments as follows:

We have changed our attitude in regard to evaporated milk in the last ten years, since much research work has been done in the nutrition laboratories and in the baby hospitals. It has been found that both evaporated and dried milk change very little in food value, and also that the process of preparing them makes the "curd" which develops as soon as milk reaches the stomach, so much smaller, that the processed milks are more easily digested than fresh milk. Pediatricians are ordering these milks, or boiled fresh milk—some of them even use freshly soured milk for infant feeding.

Those of us who have been brought up on fresh milk, do not usually care for the flavor of evaporated milk for drinking. Dr. Lydia Roberts of the University of Chicago, in an experiment with children, finds that after a short time they will take evaporated milk cheerfully, if urged in the proper way. The market orders of the relief association are, however, including an equal amount of fresh and canned milk, the latter for use in cooking.

In cooking, not so much difference is noticed, and in some dishes the flavor of evaporated milk is considered an improvement. I know a college girl who after years of making cocoa with evaporated milk, prefers it to sweet milk, and practically every one likes it as well. With caramel or chocolate flavor, it is always as good, or better. In a highly seasoned dish it seems to give little difference to the flavor. The fact that it can be whipped makes it an inexpensive substitute for cream in dessert. I have found that if a tiny bit of gelatine is added according to directions given, the time of whipping can be cut down to about three minutes.

The point in all diets of low cost or high cost that is important is to see that plenty of milk is used, because it is practically impossible to fulfill the requirements of nutrition without it. It makes no difference whether milk is drunk as a beverage, or whether it is eaten in soups, cream dishes, or desserts.

Once upon a time, before we knew so much about vitamins and minerals, milk was called the "perfect food." Now that term is modified to the "most nearly perfect" food. Children depend upon it for protein, calcium, phosphorus and a goodly share of the vitamin supply. Adults get their protein supply from other foods, but it is difficult for them to obtain the calcium they need from a milkless diet. It makes the question of vitamins less difficult.

While adults are not building new bone or teeth, they need the calcium to replace the breaking down of hard substances of the body, which is constantly going on. The other day a business man who has not believed that grownups need milk, asked a famous nutritionist his opinion—the answer was trite and to the point, "Milk is an essential during the whole learning period."

Gingerbread Custard.

4 egg yolks
½ cup sugar
Salt
2 teaspoons vanilla
1 quart milk, or 2 cups evaporated milk and 2 cups water
2 cups gingerbread crumbs

Beat yolks of eggs, add sugar, salt, vanilla and milk. Fold in gingerbread crumbs. Pour in pudding dish, set in hot water and bake in moderate oven, 375 degrees Fahrenheit. Serve hot or cold with cream.

HAVE YOU Pains and Aches?

DR Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery builds up the stomach and the blood so that the entire system feels the beneficial effect. Your appetite increases and you feel more peppy than you have felt in years. Read what James T. Nash of 158 Como Ave., St. Paul, says: "Some years ago I was in bad shape. The pains were so severe I would scream if any one touched me. Doctors claimed it was the cords that were drawn up. I noticed a decided change as soon as I started taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and after taking three bottles of it I was able to walk without any trouble." All druggists.

HER DOUBLE CHIN IS VANISHING

Shape Growing Normal

"Why am I taking Kruschen Salts? Because I was getting so broad across the hips I was ashamed of myself. I've been taking Kruschen about 2 months and they certainly are bringing my shape down to a normal condition and what is nice about them (to my way of thinking) is they haven't taken flesh from my cheeks but to my surprise my double chin is vanishing for which anyone should be glad." Mrs. P. E. Gardner, Worcester, Mass. (Jan. 3, 1933).

To lose fat and at the same time gain in physical attractiveness and feel spirited and youthful take one half teaspoonful of Kruschen in a glass of hot water before breakfast every morning.

A jar that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle at any drugstore in the world but be sure and get Kruschen Salts the SAFE way to reduce wide hips, prominent front and double chin and again feel the joy of living—money back if dissatisfied after the first jar.

The SILVER FLUTE

A Charming and Unusual Romance

by

LIDA LARRIMORE

Barbara Thorne, after becoming engaged to Bruce MacLain, is left, by the sudden death of her artist father, in charge of the family fortunes. Reluctant to accept assistance from well-meaning but wholly unsympathetic relatives, Barbara decides to take her entire "family"—Kit, Gay, Jamie and even Chips, the dog—to visit her unknown Godfather.

The fact that Stephen Drake, the Godfather, is only forty and a decidedly eligible bachelor, comes as a surprise to Barbara, and when Stephen falls in love with her the situation verges on the brink of tragedy—for Bruce is waiting at home for Barbara, and Emily Trent had her heart set on Stephen.

Miss Larrimore has told a tender, charming story with all the gaiety, humor and pathos that have made her novels so notable.

And it all ends happily as all love stories should, and as you would have it end.

You will enjoy reading it as it appears serially in these columns

DEER ARE PLENTIFUL IN MINNESOTA WOODS

Despite the open season on deer last fall, when thousands of hunters made their kills in the northern Minnesota woods, the animals are in just as great, or greater numbers than ever, a poll of chief district game wardens conducted by the Associated Press disclosed.

In addition several of the wardens said their districts were witnesses to the largest flights of migratory birds in many years. Others said the flights were at least normal.

Axel Nelson, chief warden at Roseau, said the deer in his territory is holding its own very well, while pheasants and Hungarian partridges are increasing very fast. The migratory game birds, he said have shown up in good numbers as compared with other years, and if anything in greater numbers than in the last few years.

There are more deer in Polk, Norman, Mahnomen, Red Lake, Pennington, Marshall counties, and part of Beltrami than ever before, Wm. F. Munch, district chief game warden at Crookston said. In addition elk have been introduced into the area by the state department of conservation.

Upland game birds, he stated, are as plentiful as ever, with the loss over winter about one-tenth of one per cent. This was made possible, he said, by the establishment of 325 feeding stations in the area during the winter, at which he estimated more than 16,000 birds were fed.—Grand Forks Herald.

GRASSHOPPER SITUATION SERIOUS NEAR WARREN

The grasshopper situation is becoming serious in Marshall county and unless immedeate action is taken to kill the pests there will be extensive damage done, according to Oscar Pearson, chairman of the countywide hopper campaign. The insects have been hatching out in great numbers during the last few days. Poison bait supplies can be secured in all parts of the county and townships are being adviced to organize quickly to poison the hoppers while they are young. Plenty of moisture has caused grains to grow rapidly giving bright prospects for a bumper crop. Some sweet clover already is being cut and other hay crops are good.

Mr. and Mrs. Guy Anderson and daughter Inez, and Mr. and Mrs. John Simonson returned home Saturday evening from a visit with the Erick Erickson family at International Falls and a two days stay at Bemidji. Mr. Simonson reported seeing many fine deer on the trip from the Falls to Bemidji.

Free Canning Demonstration At Middle River on June 22

Growing a good supply of garden vegetables is only half the battle of providing a plentiful winter food supply. The other half is to preserve the vegetables, through proper canning, storing, picking, drying or other means. Most important perhaps is canning. Homemakers in this locality are to have the opportunity to hear safe, easy canning methods explained and to see them put into practice by a specialist thoroughly conversant with the best canning knowledge.

S. S. Easter, county relief worker, has arranged with F. M. Rarig and Miss Grace Guilford, supervisors of federal relief under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and with Miss Julia O. Newton, state home demonstrator leader, of the agricultural extension service, University Farm, St. Paul, to have Mrs. Therese Ostrander spend two days in this county, giving demonstrations in as many locations. The schedule will be as follows: Argyle, June 21st; Middle River, June 22nd.

Each of these demonstrations will be given in the afternoon, beginning at 2:00 o'clock, and everyone who can is urged to be present. The specialist, Mrs. Ostrander, will discuss the whole subject of home canning of vegetables, giving suggestions on what to can, how much of each vegetable to can per person, how to prepare the vegetables for canning, methods to use, causes of food spoilage, and other essential facts. Then she will actually proceed to can several jars each of some green vegetable, some peas or beans, and some tomatoes. These vegetables represent the three different types of garden products and so illustrate the methods and practices needed by the home canner.

In addition to her discussion and demonstration, Mrs. Ostrander will be glad to answer questions. More important still, she will have a supply of bulletins, written by Miss Inez M. Hobart, nutrition specialist of the home demonstration staff, University Farm, which homemakers may take away with them. These bulletins not only give the essential facts about canning, but contain numerous recipes for serving canned vegetables in attractive ways. An especially valuable feature of the bulletin is a time table for canning all kinds of vegetables and fruits.

Mrs. Ostrander is well qualified to give these demonstrations. She was born at New Ulm. in Brown county, Minnesota, and is a home economics graduate of the University of Montana. For several years she taught home economics in high schools at Nicollet, Lamberton and Springfield, Minnesota, after which she was home demonstration agent in Freeborn county for several years, headquartering at Albert Lea.

As an additional help to home canners in this county, two local homemakers from each township or community will be given a special training course by Mrs. Ostrander. These women will then act as canning leaders in their communities to advice home canners or possibly to give local canning demonstrations.

The special training for these leaders will be given on the forenoon just before each public demonstration. Only the canning leaders will be permitted to attend this training course at which they will be made thoroughly familiar with the facts about canning and given special suggestions on how to put on demonstrations, or advice their neighbors on canning problems.

A large delegation of ladies from this community will attend the demonstration in Middle River on Thursday afternoon, June 22.

Bell Chosen for Judgeship

ROBERT C. BELL

Minnesota's new Federal District judge, according to word from Washington. He was nomited last Thursday by President Roosevelt, and will succeed the late Judge William A. Cant of Duluth.

State Senator Bell of Detroit Lakes, the newly-nominated federal judge for Minnesota, is a native of Missouri and a graduate of its university. He came to Minnesota in 1916, and located at Detroit Lakes, where he engaged in practice of law, while also operating several farms. He served as assistant attorney general of the Uuited States from 1916 to 1921, and was an unsuccessful candidate for attorney general of Minnesota in 1924. He was elected to the state senate in 1929.

Bakke-Hall

Johnnie Hall, son of Mrs. O. B. Hall of Holt and Miss Myrtle Bakke, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Bakke of Newfolden were united in marriage in that village on Saturday.

The newlyweds will make their home on a farm southwest from here.

The News extends congratulations.

Newton Taken Care Of

President Roosevelt Thursday nominated Walter H. Newton of Minnesota, former secretary to President Hoover, as a member of the federal home loan bank board—keeping a promise he made to Mr. Hoover on Inauguration day.

Mr. Hoover sent to the senate last session Mr. Newton's name for a federal judgeship but the senate refused to consider any nominations during the short session. On Inauguration day Mr. Hoover requested President Roosevelt to take care of Newton, who retired from congress to serve the last president.

American Delegation on Way to London Economic Conference—Brookhart Becomes "Agricultural Ambassador" to Russia—Morgan Inquiry Proceeds.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

SIX delegates and nineteen experts are on their way to London to represent the United States in the international economic conference from which so much is expected in the way of finding a path out of the world depression. Secretary of State Cordell Hull heads the delegation and his associates as announced by the White House are: James M. Cox, vice chairman, former governor and Democratic Presidential candidate in 1920; Senator Key Pittman of Nevada, Democrat; Senator James Couzens of Michigan, Republican; Representative Samuel D. McReynolds of Tennessee, Democrat, and Ralph W. Morrison of Texas, retired banker. Chief of the experts are William C. Bullitt, executive officer; James P. Warburg, financial adviser; Fred K. Nielsen, legal adviser, and Herbert Feis, chief technical adviser, under whom will serve several members of the "brain trust."

Rep. S. D. McReynolds

Of all the delegates the one consistent conservative is Congressman McReynolds. He is chairman of the house committee on foreign relations and his influence is expected to be potent in the deliberations of the delegation. Senator Couzens, the one Republican member, has frequently lined up with the more radical Republicans and Democrats in congress.

The administration, according to Assistant Secretary of State Raymond Moley, has considerably modified its expectations of what the conference will accomplish, and now realizes that the prospects are definitely limited and do not include a lowering of tariffs or an immediate permanent stabilization of currencies. Secretary Hull is said to be the only one of the administration leaders who still advances the urgent necessity of a drastic international agreement to lower tariffs and trade barriers.

Mr. Moley included only the following among the solutions which probably would be obtained at the conference:

An agreement on monetary policy through action of central banks supplemented by an agreement among governments to synchronize policies of internal public expenditure.

An agreement on progressive removal of restrictions on exchange.

The international wheat conference moved from Geneva to London and there the representatives of the United States, Argentina, Australia and Canada continued their discussions. If they agree upon any plan for curtailing wheat acreage it will be submitted to the economic conference for approval.

GREAT BRITAIN, France, Italy and the other nations that owe war debts to the United States failed in their effort to have the debts included in the agenda for the economic conference, but their delegates enter the conference with the cancellation or drastic reduction of the debts their chief aim. The Roosevelt administration insists that the war debts, however important they may be, were not a major cause of the depression and are not a major remedy. Consequently the parleys in London are almost certain to develop into a great battle of diplomacy.

President Roosevelt has flatly denied that he intends to negotiate new settlements of the war debts without recourse to congress. This was made necessary by dispatches from Washington published in London, saying Mr. Roosevelt had offered to accept from Britain $10,000,000 as part payment of the $75,900,000 due June 15. It seemed fairly certain that the British government would make this payment in full. This will be easier than before because of the devaluation of the dollar. Britain can either pay in paper dollars, which cost about 2 per cent less to buy than gold dollars, or in American securities, which can be bought with paper dollars at a discount and turned in at par.

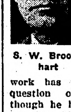
CHAMPIONS of the gold standard in both the house and the senate had little chance as the administration forces pushed through the Fletcher-Steagall resolution for the abrogation of the gold clause in all governmental and private contracts, both present and future. The measure, asked by the President to legalize action already taken, was first passed by the house by a vote of 283 to 57. Twenty-eight Republicans and all five of the Farmer-Laborites joined with the Democrats in favor of the resolution. Representative Luce of Massachusetts, who led the small minority, denounced the measure as a breach of faith on the part of the government; but Chairman Steagall of the banking committee said it was essential for the recovery of national prosperity.

INVESTIGATION of the banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co. was resumed by the senate banking committee, and a new list of important persons who had received bargains in stocks was produced. Ferdinand Pecora, the committee's counsel, was persistent in his probing, but was compelled to tell the senators, in executive session, what evidence he proposed to introduce and what he expected to prove by it, and to convince them of the propriety of his purpose. Senator Glass was still determined that Pecora should not bring out matter outside the committee's jurisdiction or irrelevant to the inquiry. Mr. Glass said he had received a number of anonymous threats by mail and what he termed "blackguard telegrams" because of his stand.

Though William H. Woodin's name was on one of the Morgan lists of "preferred" customers before he became secretary of the treasury and hence demands for his resignation were made by various men in public life, Mr. Woodin declared he had not resigned. His statement left no doubt that he would be willing to quit his office if his presence there in any way hindered the return of prosperity, but it also was interpreted to mean that Mr. Roosevelt wished him to hold on, at least for the present. More serious, perhaps, is the case of Norman H. Davis, the very active "ambassador at large" in Europe, who also was on a Morgan list. Representative George H. Tinkham of Massachusetts has demanded a congressional investigation of the financial dealings Mr. Davis may have had with international banking and business interests.

Asserting that Mr. Davis has spoken at Geneva in "repudiation of the traditional American foreign policy," Mr. Tinkham said that a congressional committee should also investigate Mr. Davis' connection with "disloyal and seditious American organizations and foundations in the United States."

SMITH WILDMAN BROOKHART, former senator from Iowa, has a new job. Secretary of Agriculture Wallace has appointed him "agricultural ambassador" to Soviet Russia, and has instructed him to explore the opportunities for disposing of American surpluses of cotton and live stock in that country. In effect, this means the opening of trade negotiations with a government that is not recognized by Washington, but Brookhart says his work has no connection with the question of diplomatic relations, though he hopes recognition will result from his efforts to effect a thriving trade between the two countries.



S. W. Brookhart

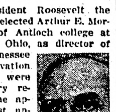
The Iowan has been given the title of "special adviser to the agricultural administration" and serves under Administrator George N. Peek.

"I've done a lot of work already," he said. "I have gone into the matter with people here, including the Soviet representative, Boris Skvirsky. He's a pretty fine fellow and I've had several talks with him."

Mr. Skvirsky is not a trade representative of the Soviet, nor has he connection with the Amtorg corporation, organized by the Soviets to transact business in America. Mr. Skvirsky said that he is a representative of the Soviet foreign office.

GERMANY has refused to accept an unfavorable report of the League of Nations on her treatment of the Jews and virtually told the league that the affair is none of its business. The league council, however, referred juridical aspects of the issue to a committee of jurists with the understanding that the matter will have a complete airing.

WHEN President Roosevelt the other day selected Arthur E. Morgan, president of Antioch college at Yellow Springs, Ohio, as director of the vast Tennessee valley conservation project, there were many derogatory remarks about the appointing of just another professor for a big job. But the skeptical ones did not know about Morgan. Since 1902, when he was just out of high school, he has been active in engineering work and has planned and supervised construction of about seventy-five water control projects. These include the important reclamation work in St. Francis valley in Arkansas and the Miami conservation project at Dayton, Ohio. He was chief engineer in the Pueblo (Colo.) conservancy district; he drafted the revised drainage codes for Minnesota, Arkansas, Ohio, Mississippi, Colorado and New Mexico, and has been consulting engineer on drainage and flood control projects all over the nation. He is entirely familiar with conditions in the Tennessee valley.



Arthur E. Morgan

REVERTING to the matter of the gold standard, dispatches from Vienna tell of how, in the seventieth congress of the International Chamber of Commerce, the United States was bitterly denounced by Charles Boissevain of Holland for what he called its "immoral" monetary course. He condemned the behavior of those nations which abandon the gold standard "although unquestionably in a position to maintain it." He condemned also what he described as the "repudiation" of the gold clause in contracts by the United States.

In the transportation section, Ira Campbell of New York defended United States shipping against what he termed an international attempt to rule it off the seas. American merchant marine cannot exist without subsidy, he said, and an international agreement to abolish subsidies would mean the abolition of American ships.

W. L. Runciman of Great Britain objected to his argument that the American marine is needed for national defense, asserting such argument is out of place in a commercial congress.

War debts also came up for discussion. W. H. Coates, British delegate, asserting that they must be settled before it would be possible to improve world economic conditions.

MILITARY representatives of Japan and China signed a formal armistice in the warfare in north China at Tangku, where the negotiations took place under the guns of Japanese naval craft. The truce provides for demilitarization of the area bounded by the great wall on the north, the Peiping-Mukden railway on the east and the Peiping-Suiyuan railway on the west; for dissolution of the Chinese volunteer corps in this area and for resumption of rail traffic between Peiping and Shanhaikwan.

Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang

Just before the signing of the truce the banner of revolt against the Chinese Nationalist government was raised by Gen. Feng Yu-hsiang, usually alluded to as the "Christian general." Feng denounced Gen. Chiang Kai-shek, the dictator, as a traitor and announced himself as commander-in-chief of the "people's anti-Japanese army." He had been recruiting a large force at Kalgan and it was believed he was acting in close co-operation with the army of Canton, which was reported to be moving to the northward. In Tientsin it was thought that Feng must have been receiving large supplies of arms and ammunition from the Russians of Mongolia by the old caravan route from Urga.

The National government issued a declaration that the Tangku truce is entirely local and of a temporary nature.

"It is not incompatible with the declared policy of continuing a sustained resistance and efforts for the recovery of lost territories," the statement said.

"It is absolutely impossible for the National government to agree to an ignominious surrender since the Manchurian issue is entirely outside the sphere of the local military truce with Peiping."

LANSING state penitentiary near Leavenworth, Kan., was the scene of a sensational escape of 11 convicts who were led by Wilbur Underhill, a lifer and one of the most desperate outlaws of the Southwest. During a baseball game Warden Prather and two guards were seized, used as shields and forced to accompany the fleeing convicts over the wall. Other guards were disarmed and the men got away in the car of the prison farm superintendent, keeping their prisoners with them as hostages until hours later, when they were released in Oklahoma. In their flight they commandeered two other cars and captured three women, who were set free near Pleasanton, Kans.

SIX bandits held up the State Exchange bank of Culver, Ind., and fled in an automobile with $16,000. But the men of the town had been trained as vigilantes and, receiving word of the crime, they mobilized immediately under command of Captain Obenauf of the Culver Military academy and went into action. Result: All six bandits were captured, one of them being fatally wounded, and the loot was recovered.

ONE hundred thousand spectators saw Louis Meyer of California win the 500-mile automobile race at the Indianapolis speedway in record-breaking time. They also saw a series of fatal accidents that sadly marred the great spectacle. Three men were killed and three others were badly injured. Mark Billman of Indianapolis was crushed to death when he lost control of his car and it crashed into the retaining wall, and Elmer Lombard, his mechanic, was hurt. Later the car driven by Malcomb Fox of New Jersey lost a wheel and skidded into the middle of the track where it was smashed by the car of Lester Spangler of Los Angeles. Spangler and G. L. Jordan, his mechanic, lost their lives, and Bert Cook, Fox's mechanic, was injured.

In a test run the day before the big race William Denver and Robert Hurst lost their lives.

Meyer completed the run in 4 hours and 48 minutes, his average speed being 104.162 miles an hour. He won $12,000 first prize money and $1,150 in lap prizes.

Bells and Bells

By ELSIE YOUNGHANS

©. by McClure Newspaper Syndicate. WNU Service

THE Princess Alexandria Sophia stirred ever so slightly. The day was breaking and a ray of light shone dimly on her small white face. Her eyelids fluttered, but were still too weary to lift their heavy fringe of lashes. She pulled the cover closer around her shoulders. Cold! Cold! Really she must ask Katja to unpack Aunt Anna Karlova's coverlet. That funny cover of lace and fur and silk that Aunt Karlova had spent an entire year in embroidering.

Winter! It must be winter! For suddenly sleighbells were ringing in the streets. Strangely muffled and far away they sounded. Perhaps a heavy snow had fallen during the night. Bells! Bells! Bells! An incessant ringing of them . . . an unending procession of them. Would they never stop! Where were they all going? Ah! But of course! Strange that she shouldn't have remembered. Suddenly it was clear as crystal. How could she have forgotten! Her wedding day! This was her wedding day! The jingling droshkas were bringing the wedding guests. From distant provinces, from the suburbs, from Moscow itself, were coming uncles and aunts and cousins—Victor's as well as her own; schoolmates, friends, officers from Victor's regiment, officials from the court and their families. Why, there must be hundreds of them, thousands of them, there were so many bells! And all coming to celebrate her wedding, her's and Victor's. Yet a strange weight lay on Alexandria Sophia! She felt she was not moving—that she was powerless to move.

And now, as suddenly as they had started, the bells stopped. The guests, then, were all assembled—all waiting. And Victor, her adorable Victor, he, too, would be waiting! How splendid he would look in his uniform of the Imperial guard, all white and gold, with the flashing order of St. Stanislaus upon his breast. Ah, but he was wonderful! Swiftly, swiftly, her thoughts flew back to the day she had met him. It was at the ball at the Dolgoruk palace; she was making her first formal appearance in society. Victor had asked her to lead the procession with him. They had passed through an arch of flags, and instead of returning to the ballroom, he had carried her off to the gardens. Under the willow by the fountain, he had kissed her, and told her she was the most divinely lovely thing God had created. And now here at last, she and Victor were to be married—never, so Victor had sworn, would he allow her to part from him.

But suddenly, more guests seemed to be arriving—there were the sleighbells again. The wedding banquet must be already spread in the great hall. But she, Alexandria Sophia, the bride, she was not there. Where was she? Oh, where was Katja? Why didn't Katja bring the wedding dress, that shimmering thing that had been sent from Paris? Where was the veil with headdress of pearls that had been worn by her mother, and her grandmother, and by countless Orlofski brides before them? Why this strange sense of impending doom in Alexandria Sophia's heart! Why this pain, this anguished foreboding—this heavy, heavy weight!

Sleighbells! Sleighbells! Would they never stop? Was all of Moscow coming to her wedding? And she, the bride, not ready—not ready! Ah! They were calling her—it seemed she was hiding somewhere. They were coming for her, some one was pounding at the door, shaking it. Dear God! Some one was breaking in. Why, she had been asleep, fast asleep! Her eyes were still dazed, her mind vague:

Some one stood on the threshold. Katja? good old Katja with the wedding dress? But, no, of course it wasn't Katja . . . it couldn't be Katja. The little princess was wide-awake at last . . . rushing with a shudder into the complete awareness. A slovenly woman in a faded wrapper stood before her. She was holding out a thick white cup and talking: "See, dearie, it's coffee I'm after bringing up to ye. I feared as ye'd oversleep this morning, it was so late you got in last night, poor lamb, poor little lamb."

Ah! Awake! How terrible to be awake! To realize the truth! To know that she was only Sophie Orloff, apprentice at a dressmaking establishment, that she lived in a hall room in Mrs. Murphy's boarding house on Lenox avenue, that she had overslept and would be late to her job. And bitterest of all, to remember that she is no longer young, no longer beautiful, that no one in all the world really cares what happens to her.

Victor? Katja? Aunt Anna Karleva? Where were they? The Dolgoruki palace, court balls, wedding veils of lace, silken coverlets? Gone, gone! Borzo Moi! Long and long ago had they all vanished. War, revolution, Red fury had annihilated these dear people—these once familiar things. They had vanished utterly, but she was left, to live on, adrift, alone.

But suddenly the muffled bells again. Now at last she knew their real meaning. With a despairing gesture, she pulled an alarm clock from under the pillow and threw it against the wall. "It didn't wake me," she sobbed, "it didn't wake me at all. It made me dream. . . . Ah, Mrs. Murphy . . . it is not good to dream of sleighbells in my Russia!"

Knitted Things Demand Extra Care in Washing

Have you succumbed to the knitting or crocheting fever? Whether or not, you certainly have sweaters, knitted suits, etc., for who can be without them these days? They're so attractive, and almost indispensable for sport and everyday wear, and if washable, as many of them are, it's so easy to keep them clean.

Before washing a new sweater, test it to be sure the colors are fast, by squeezing an inconspicuous portion in clear, lukewarm water for five minutes or so.

Knitted things often get out of shape when wet, so to insure restoring them to the correct proportions just draw an outline on clean, wrapping paper before wetting. Incidentally, the ideal time to draw this outline is when the sweater is new, before you have stretched the elbows, etc. Then this outline may be used each time you wash the sweater.

Remove unwashable buttons, buckles, etc., and turn the sweater wrong-side out. Make rich suds with mild, neutral soap flakes; always have the suds and rinse waters lukewarm or cool. Put in the sweater and wash by squeezing the suds through and through the material. Never rub. Wash quickly. Do not soak colored garments.

Thoroughly rinse in plenty of lukewarm or cool water. Squeeze out the water—don't twist. Then roll the sweater in a dry turkish towel, knead for a moment and unroll. Don't leave colored garments rolled up while wet. Ease the sweater into shape on the outline. If the sweater tends to shrink, pin it in place on a firm surface as on corrugated pasteboard, or an old rug. Use pins which will not rust.

When the sweater is dry remove it from the outline, turn it right-side out and press it lightly, using a damp cloth to remove wrinkles and pin marks.

Statecraft No Bar to Triumph in Other Arts

Since Mr. Woodin (we are undecided whether that is pronounced "Woodeen" or not), plays a zither, we hear, music may still be said to be represented in the cabinet. Public men and statesmen who are musically inclined are not altogether rare. Charles G. Dawes, ex-Vice President, composed a meritorious piece for the violin; Nick Longworth was an expert in music; Jimmy Walker wrote a popular song. The world's greatest pianist was Poland's prime minister, and is sought for that post again.

In ancient Greece and also in Rome, a publicist could write verses without being considered too artist-minded for practical affairs. We shall not go so far as to dwell on the fact that an emperor of Rome was a poet, though an indifferent one.

Coming back to modern times, President Wilson could write limericks and John Quincy Adams is remembered for a first-class satirical poem. The Muses are by no means shy of the administrative type of intellect. It is perhaps true that that type seldom permits itself to wander in the fields of the gentler arts, though it might easily shine there if it wished.—F. H. Collier, in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Feels 20 Years Younger

"I surely can recommend Kruschen Salts. I reduced from 156 to 110 lbs., my natural weight and I feel 20 years younger. 'A pinch a day, keeps the fat away.'" Mrs. Vale Walter, Seattle, Washington (Dec. 30, 1932).

Once a day take Kruschen Salts—one half teaspoonful in a glass of hot water first thing every morning. Besides losing ugly fat SAFELY you'll gain in health and physical attractiveness—constipation, gas and acidity will cease to bother—you'll feel younger—more active—full of ambition—clear skin—sparkling eyes.

A jar that lasts 4 weeks costs but a trifle at any drugstore in the world—but demand and get Kruschen and if one bottle doesn't joyfully satisfy you—money back.

SYNOPSIS

On her eighteenth birthday, Barbara, motherless daughter of Christopher Thorne, lovable but impractical artist, awakes with lively anticipation of the joys of the day. She receives, among other presents, a birthday ring from Bruce MacLain, young artist friend of the family, but more than friend to Barbara.

CHAPTER II

—3—

The car, a roadster with battered fenders and one blind headlight, rattled along, threatening at every jounce to shake itself into bits.

"Comfortable?" Bruce asked, above the noise of the engine.

She nodded. Bruce was looking, side-wise, at the small excited person whose shoulder brushed his arm. When he was alone he thought he knew her by heart, the way her hair waved back from her forehead, her tilted nose, the dimple that woke when she smiled. And yet, each time he saw her again, she was a fresh surprise. Darling! he thought. Lovely child! . . .

They left the town behind. Bruce gave the car the gas. Barbara liked to travel at top speed over this stretch of road. He heard her little excited squeals. He felt her hand clutch his arm. She enjoyed things so. Life was an adventure to Babbie. It would be always, he thought. Good Lord! Was that waddling thing a goose! . . .

The car swerved with a sudden jolt and stopped on the brink of a ditch. Barbara tumbled against him. He felt her hair, silky and soft, brushing across his cheek. . . .

"Did we hit it?" she asked breathlessly.

"I don't think so." He found it difficult to keep his mind on the goose.

They looked back. The goose, safe at the side of the road, glared at them, scolded shrilly, smoothed its ruffled feathers.

The car rattled on down the curving road. Barbara chattered gayly, discovered wonders along the way. Bruce was silent, lost in thought.

What would she have said, he wondered, if he had put the ring on her other hand? He had wanted to but he had been afraid. She looked so young in that yellow jersey with the ribbon around her hair. Did she understand that he loved her, as a man loves a woman, that he wanted to share the adventure of her life? There were times when she seemed grown up. But this morning, under the willows, except for a moment, her eyes had been younger than Gay's. Better wait. But suppose he should lose her. Someone would always be falling in love with Barbara. He was leaving tomorrow. . . .

Barbara, silent now, watched the trees running past. What was Bruce thinking? He was so quiet, looking straight ahead. Was he, too, feeling sad, in spite of being so happy? He seemed to have forgotten her. She had only imagined that, under the willows, he had looked at her in a different sort of way. She felt, all at once, very small and lost and forlorn.

But the feeling vanished when they scrambled down the steep drop of slipping sand to the beach. She couldn't feel forlorn. It was such a beautiful day.

They raced down the wide white beach. They played with a beach ball and invented a brand new game. It was fun to shout and sing and make a lot of noise. There was no one to hear them. They were alone in a world of sand and sunshine, a blue and golden world, sunshine and ocean and sky.

They opened the basket of lunch and gobbled like greedy children. Everything tasted so good. And there was a surprise in the bottom of the basket—maple candy stuffed with hickory nuts. Martha had bothered to make it. Wasn't Martha a dear?

When they couldn't hold another crumb, they stretched out on the blankets. Bruce lit a cigarette and blew smoke rings, one inside the other. Barbara admired them. She admired Bruce. He was so good looking, his golden brown tan, his eyes that were as deeply blue as the sky on a frosty night. It was fun to be with him, lying there, drowsy and warm, washed with waves of sunlight. Because she was happy she hummed the song that all day long had been singing through her mind—

We sail the ocean blue
We catch-a da plenty-a fish—

Bruce propped himself on his elbow to see her more distinctly. She lay, curled like a kitten, her eyes half closed, her head pillowed on her arm. Tenderness swelled in his heart.

"Babbie," he said gently.

"Hmm?"

"Babbie . . . I'm leaving tomorrow."

The humming ceased. Her brown eyes opened wide.

"Leaving, Bruce?"

"Going back to New York."

Barbara turned her head. She didn't want Bruce to see her face. She knew she was going to cry.

It was strange, she thought, that she should want to cry about Bruce. Last year and the year before he was just one of the young artists who came, in the summer, to Provincetown and were always stopping in at the house to talk to Father and look at his paintings and drink his wild cherry wine. Only Bruce was nicer looking than any of the others, more friendly and amusing. Father liked him especially. The children liked him, too. And she had liked him—the way she liked old Ramon the shoemaker and Manuel who took her sailing and all of her Provincetown friends. . . .

"Babbie! Look at me, Babbie. . . ."

She couldn't look at him then. She looked, instead, at a puffy cloud sailing across the sky. This summer it had been different. From the very first, she decided. It was the way Bruce had looked at her the day he came back to Provincetown last June. "You're growing up, Babbie," Bruce had said and somehow the look in his smiling blue eyes had made her feel happy and shy. . . .

"Babbie, dear . . ."

His voice sounded sorry about something. Maybe Bruce had guessed and was sorry because she loved him so much. Her heart turned over with the surprise of a discovery. Why, she loved Bruce, not as she loved Father and the children, but in another way, the way Mother had loved Father. That was why it had been different this summer. That was why she wanted to cry, sometimes, and was always imagining things. Bruce had guessed. He must have known it all along, when he was teasing her and telling her things about her eyes. Bruce had guessed. He was sorry because she loved him so much. . . .

They Were Alone in a World of Sand and Sunshine.

"Babbie," he said again. "I'm leaving tomorrow. I'm going back to New York."

She felt so miserable she wanted to die. But Bruce mustn't be sorry for her. She swallowed past a sudden lump in her throat and made her voice sound gay.

"Well," she said, not looking at him, "I hope you'll have a nice trip."

Bruce heard her voice, gay and lilting and unconcerned. A shadow slipped across his face. He couldn't see that her lashes were wet with tears.

The sky had clouded over. The wind was rising.

"It's going to storm," Bruce said. "We'd better turn back."

"Where did it come from?" Barbara asked. "It's been a beautiful day."

"There was a red sky this morning." They had turned and were walking rapidly. The wind rose higher, blowing the sand, frothing the waves with white-caps.

Red sky at morning
Sailors take warning,

Barbara sang, exhilarated by the wind. "That isn't good poetry, is it, Bruce?"

"Better save your breath," he advised.

He took her hand and they tried to run. The wind pushed them back. The blowing sand stung their eyes. The waves made a crashing sound, pounding against the shore.

"Bruce!" Barbara cried, clinging fast to his hand. "I can't move! I can't keep my feet on the ground!"

"Try," he shouted, bending his head so she could hear. "If we can make that shack—"

They had noticed it as they walked up the beach, a shack made of planks and branches crazily nailed together, set in a sheltered curve of the sand bank. Children had built it, they thought. They had smiled at it as they walked up the beach. Now it seemed a safe haven, a refuge from the storm. They made it after a struggle, dropped, breathless and panting, on the sand beneath the flimsy roof of pine branches.

It was a refuge of sorts. In the sheltered curve of the sand bank they were protected from the fury of the wind. Through a film of blowing sand they saw the waves dashing up on the beach. They waited for the rain.

"No rain?" Barbara asked, after an interval.

"It's a wind storm," Bruce answered. "Are you cold?"

"Sort of."

"Wish we had the blankets. Come here. There! That's better, isn't it?"

It was lovely, she thought, to have Bruce hold her close, to feel through the soft flannel shirt the comforting warmth of his body. The wind shook the flimsy roof.

Herd Association Idea an Old One

Danish Farmers Raised Milk Production 8,000 Pounds by Testing Plan.

By S. M. Salisbury, Professor of Dairying, Ohio State University.—WNU Service.

Dairymen in Ohio accepted a lesson from the dairymen of Denmark when they organized dairy herd improvement associations, or cow testing associations, as they are most commonly called.

The forerunners of the modern Ohio herd improvement associations were the Kontrol societies of Denmark, organized 40 years ago. The Kontrol society, like the 30 modern Ohio dairy herd improvement associations, was formed to provide for a monthly visit of a tester. The tester weighed the milk produced by each cow in the herd and sampled it for butterfat testing. He also kept a record of feed consumed and computed production costs for each individual cow in the herd.

From these records, kept year after year, the dairymen of Denmark were able to cull from their herds the poor cows and find and keep the good ones. So effective were the associations in Denmark that the country raised the average production per cow to 8,000 pounds of milk and 300 pounds of butterfat. Average production of Ohio herds is about 5,000 pounds.

Testing year in and year out with an eye to the low-producing individuals and their elimination from all future pedigrees offers our only hope for continued brooding of useful dairy cattle.

Plant Beach Grass to Check the Blowing Sand

The first private attempt to reclaim thousands of acres of shifting sand in New York state was made recently near Brushton, in Franklin county. Nearly 5,000 clumps of beach grass were planted on a farm.

The field, which is representative of nearly 10,000 acres in Franklin county, and of more acres in nine counties surrounding the Adirondacks, is worse than waste land, for it will not grow crops and is a menace to a nearby road. The field grew 30 bushels of buckwheat to the acre 30 years ago, and five years ago an attempt was made to hold the sand by planting trees. The trees were literally blown from the field.

The beach grass has been used successfully in France, and by the Long Island park commission at Jones beach. The grass is propagated by stolons, or underground stems, and makes a mat so thick that trees may be planted on the ground within two or three years. The clumps of grass are planted about 18 inches apart and the 5,000 clumps planted about a quarter acre, or enough to show whether the method is successful.

Erosion on Piedmont Land

Five million of the 50,000,000 acres of Piedmont country extending from near New York city to central Alabama, along the east side of the Appalachian mountains, have been essentially destroyed by soil erosion as far as their use for crops is concerned, the United States Department of Agriculture says. In addition to these 5,000,000 acres which have been ruined, more than 13,000,000 acres have had the surface soil largely or completely stripped off by erosion. Although many farmers continue to cultivate patches of this land, they are able to make only the barest living. In 1924, when prices were much higher than now, the gross income of many families on these denuded areas, where the family averaged more than five members, was only $300 a year. To prevent such erosion destruction, the department recommends terraces, tree planting, strip cropping, brush dams to prevent gullying, and similar practices.

Control of Stomach Worms

Rotating pastures so that lambs do not graze on land where sheep ranged the year before is one of the best control measures. But even where permanent pastures must be used, stomach worms can be controlled by drenching with a bluestone or copper sulphate solution. This treatment is easy to give and costs very little.

Agricultural Squibs

Iowa claims the largest proportion of actually arable land.

Cherry tres respond more readily to nitrogen fertilizers than do apple or plum trees.

Tomatoes will grow on 45,000 acres of the Ozark hills in Arkansas, say canners of the area.

Tennessee hay, corn and tobacco production declined from 10 to 20 per cent in 1932 under the year before.

• • •

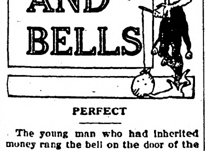
North Dakota is the only state in which the milk produced in every county averages 90 gallons or more per capita annually.

• • •

Dairy products are now first in the amount of gross farm income, a position formerly held by cattle, hogs, and sheep as a group.

• • •

New York state potato growers plan to cut their acreage about 8 per cent, or 17,000 acres for 1933. The 30 leading late potato states plan a 6 per cent cut, or 164,000 acres.



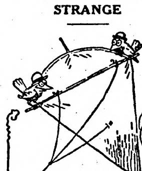
PERFECT

The young man who had inherited money rang the bell on the door of the "School of Deportment." He had decided to learn how to carry himself in society. A bowing Frenchman begged him to enter.

"You give lessons in deportment, don't you?" inquired the young man.

"The best, m'sieu!" gushed the proprietor. "My system it ees perfect. Two weeks ago a young man like you, m'sieu, he take only three of my lessons in deportment, and—yesterday he was deported!"—Tit-Bits Magazine.

STRANGE



Bird—It's funny, Bill, this thing has no wings, but it flies almost as well as we do!

Unhappy Highwaymen

"Any highwaymen in Crimson Gulch?" said the commercial traveler.

"A few," answered Cactus Joe. "You can see their dust a quarter of a mile up the road."

"What are they running away from?"

"You. The last high-power salesman that hit the village left the boys tied up with monthly installments that they won't be able to pay for years to come."

One Who Won

Miss Slater—Are you living in the handsome house left you by your aunt, Colonel—the house you went to law about?

Colonel—No, my lawyer resides there.—Pearson's Magazine.

His Lucky Day

"Mr. McTavish, last night I dreamt you gave me twopence tip."

"Rather a lot, but you may keep it this time."—Hummel (Hamburg).

Imagination

She—Do you remember where you were first struck by my beauty?

He—Yes, dearest. It was at a masked ball.—Boston Transcript.

No Stopping It

Teacher—Willie, what is an adult?

Willie—An adult is one that has stopped growing except in the middle. —Kansas City Star.

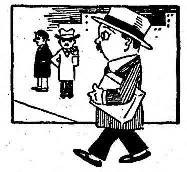
Quite Capable

Man—Is New York the next stop?

Porter—Yes, sah; brush you off, sah?

Man—No, I'll get off myself.—Montreal Gazette.

UNANIMOUS



"What sort of fellow is Jones?"

"Well, he means well."

"So you think him a nuisance, too."

Her Alibi

Policeman—This won't do, madam. Your car has been here 20 minutes. I timed it by your clock.

Lady Motorist—By the clock in there? Oh, you can't go by that, it's fast.—Humorist Magazine.

Miracle Man

"Doctor, when this injured hand heals, will I be able to play the piano all right?"

"Why, certainly."

"Doc, you're a wonder. I never could play it before!"

Heartfelt Eloquence

Henry—Did you-all evah speak befo' a large audience, Gawge?

Gawge—Ah 'low ah did, once, yowsah.

Henry—What did you-all say?

Gawge—Ah said "Not guilty."—Farm Journal.

His Humble Opinion

Motorist (inquiring his way)—Boy, am I all right for the zoo?

Bright Lad—As far as I know you are, mister, but I'm not running the zoo.—Montreal Gazette.

First American Journalist

Benjamin Harris, Englishman, Given Distinction.

The Colophon, a book collector's quarterly, has brought to the notice of its clientele the lively career of Benjamin Harris, "printer, bookseller, and the first American journalist." He deserves a wider acquaintance. After various and picturesque adventures and vicissitudes (including exposure in the pillory in London) as a publisher of his own writings and those of others, he sought refuge in New England, arriving with his wife, children, and a stock of books in 1686 in Boston, where he opened a bookshop. There were seven other booksellers in his neighborhood, but he prospered and became "the leading publisher and bookseller of the Seventeenth century in America." His shop was a social and intellectual center where "coffee, tee, and chucaletto" were sold as well as books. He published many books, pamphlets and broadsides, notably "The New England Primer," which has been termed "the most remarkable book ever published in America," borrowed in part from a work which he had himself earlier published in England to teach children spelling.

As the publisher of a newspaper in America his experience was very brief. It began with a small sheet, September 25, 1690, carrying three pages of news, the fourth being blank. He called it "Publick Occurrences" (foreign and domestick) and planned to publish it monthly, or "if any Glut of occurrences happen, oftener." His purpose was threefold:

"First, that memorable occurents of Divine Providence may not be neglected or forgotten as they too often are . . . secondly, that the people of Boston may better know public affairs, and, thirdly, that something may be done towards the curing, or at least the charming, of that spirit of lying, which prevails among us."

There were no advertisements. The news in the first number included reports of the kidnapings of two children by Indians, of certain Indian atrocities, of a Christianized Indian Thanksgiving service, of the suicide of a man who had lost his wife, of a murder at sea, of a disastrous fire, of the breaking out of smallpox, and of alleged immorality of the French king. But this last named reflection of "a very high nature" and "sundry and doubtful reports," together with the publisher's failure to procure a license, led to the prompt suppression of this first number by the governor and council, who caused to be published a broadside proclaiming their "high Resentment and Disallowance." And a second number never appeared.

Harris returned to England some years later, where he published several papers successfully, and also sold sermons, playing cards, almanacs, and patent medicines. One regrets with Mr. Frank Monaghan, who relates this engaging story, that Harris is no longer over at the Golden Boar's Head dispensing his "only Angelical Pills," for, as was claimed in his advertisement, they had potency to "rejoice the heart," to "revive the natural spirits," to "drive away melancholy," to "expel dejected thoughts," and to "preserve the whole frame of nature." It is not known how long he himself survived the "Cavils of This World," for the date of his death, as well as of his birth, is unknown. But he is lastingly remembered in the Dictionary of American Biography because of his priority, and might have had a place there for other reasons (since he had a marked sense of news value and a vigorous style in writing) if the official censor had not made the first number of his American newspaper the last.—New York Times.

Youth Needs Schooling as to Others' Rights?

If a state is to have a civilized population, its children must be taught to behave like civilized beings, Claire Williams writes, in the Forum and Century. This instruction, I think, should begin in the nursery schools. A child's universe is bounded by his skin; so is an infantile adult's; and the behavior of these two types is likely to approach too close to savagery for the general welfare.

About the most important thing the child has to learn is that the world is full of other people, whose rights he must observe, and with whom he must be scrupulous in the fulfillment of his obligations.

You may think this a trite observation; but anybody who sees much of youth knows scores of young persons of good family who grow to the age of sixteen or seventeen gloriously unaware that there is anyone else on earth who has any rights, or that they themselves have, or could possibly incur, any obligations to anyone else. Their negligent parents have failed to point out these elementary facts.
